Apologia

Something Solid, unlike Apparition Poems, is a book which knows its place. The God-forsaken violence of the poems strung in numbers is replaced by the textual sangfroid of consolidation with the core values which render poetry useful for most literary landscapes— incidents and situations chosen for interrogation, involving the poet in memory, sensuality, and the formality of the traditional sonnet (and newfangled double sonnet, twenty-eight lines). It represents a downward curve, as it were, into these topos, rather than an upward curve into serious philosophical discourse. What would make the book more than a curiosity (or, perhaps, anti-curiosity) to such discourse, is a Barthes-ian acknowledgement of a basic literary principle which philosophy finds distasteful, but which nonetheless has and will always dictate individual literary economies— we tend to read and re-read what we find pleasurable to read and re-read. The pleasure principle inhering in texts and textuality may dictate that Something Solid, despite its not being angled in a strictly original way, will be read and re-read with more pleasure and avidity than Apparition Poems, which most, including discursive minds, may choose to respect from a distance. The version of poetic memory explored here has as its ensign an engagement with two periods in time, one place specific— the Nineties, and Aughts Philadelphia. Built into the book's willfully conventional dynamic, is the imposition, on these periods, of an aura of romantic chaos, of the possibility of the poet's consciousness, in medias res in the appointed zeitgeists, conflating internal with external vicissitudes, so that the book resonates as both completely personal and ripe for universalization. The poet stands within the text and its dramas, a self-conscious synecdoche. The narrative-thematic context is semi-autobiography.

Where sensuality is taken in the text is to a locale configured to purify and transcendentalize its manifestation into an emergence of dramatic, imaginative and tactile reality. Bodies are not seen as real but hyperreal; the carnal acts as a portal into its own effacement, into the larger existence of Eros as an idea and ideal to mystify the objective-discursive. Also, Eros subsists to express the effacement of objectivity into immediacy, drama, and the aesthetic establishing its own, rightful claim on aestheticized language, in as ideal form as the text and the poet's talent will allow. Imagination in the text establishes its own body— possibilities glimpsed, starting from sense. Undulant, an early standout from the text, performs this task— layering sensual and imaginative data, the tactile over and under the imaginative, so as to solidify, both pleasure in the text for capable readers, immersion in time-zone or zeitgeist awareness, and formal innovation for what peregrinations can be compressed into fourteen lines. This ambitious task subsists past the manner of Keats and Wordsworth, in their respective sonnets, into a Neo-Romanticism (the presumed aegis under which the text falls) of all these conflated elements, coalescing in simultaneity. Not philosophy, but not simple either. Frequencies begins from more sophisticated ground— the meta-aesthetic— one artist addressing another. Then, the poet's imagination somersaults into an assaying of the imagination of the Other. That the meta-aesthetic manifests alongside a raw revelation of carnality makes Frequencies ring out or emanate, with a Manneristic, perhaps, sense of exaggeration, on double, triple, and quadruple levels. As is not irrelevant, both Frequencies and Undulant are darkly colored, with under and overtones of chaos and violence. They do have a way of echoing Apparition Poems. Eros is not dulcet here but foreboding, edgy. Textual interrogation reveals no perceived placidity. The language knows its place, is polished; the represented situations are raw.

The text's extensive immersion in visual art, through the prominent placement in the text of Mary Evelyn Harju, Abby Heller-Burnham, and Jenny Kanzler, tilts the text towards a perpetual sense of ekphrasis, as an owned level. This level achieves a status of semi-dominance, developed along semi-dominant lines. The semi-dominance of a travelogue sensibility, from Philadelphia to New Hampshire to Montreal to Chicago, is also developed in tandem. The grounded quality of the text, against Apparition Poems, answers perversion with exuberance, a haunted house with an eternal salon, down to a series of Creatrix muses who imbue the text, as has been said, with ekphrastic intention. This coloring or imbuing culminates in Starlight I and II, a miniaturized dialectic that takes (as Equations does not, exactly) the mysticism of romance and intoxication and confers judgement or an answer on the pursual of such, amid darker ("raw") material. The objective is thus established as one (Neo-Romantic) aegis for the subjective to sit under, in a text which takes its stripes both from the cognitive and the intuitive.

The sonnet, as a poetic form, is traditionally an enemy of philosophy. Brevity and compression of data are both adversarial to the development of discourse and discursive contexts. Why the sonnet here was chosen and set into dynamic motion was to undo preconceptions regarding what the sonnet's possibilities are, in practice, if hinged to a solidly placed premise. For the book, the poet invented a form— what he calls a double sonnet— one sonnet atop another, as a twenty-eight line poem, rather than a fourteen line poem. Precisely half the poems in Something Solid are double sonnets. The expectation horizon of twenty-eight lines is, or can be construed to be, radically dissimilar to the original mere fourteen. In twenty-eight lines, the little song, angled against intellectual expansiveness, takes on a new stripe as a vessel or vehicle more pliant, more nimble, more about widening parameters so that memory, sensuality, and drama, have a more adequate stage to perform, do their tricks on. The stage should then be both adequately lit, and adequately built to support their weight. Yet, the precision of the form— twenty-eight lines— renders some compression necessary, so that the traditional sonnet geist of willing confinement, enforced brevity, and the phenomenological tension which ensues, for both poet and reader, still stakes a claim and imposes that poetry remains poetry.

For Something Solid to transcend the merely tautological— poetry being poetry, long-established tropes within poetry digging in their respective heels to reestablish their subsistence and contemporary relevance— the combination of elements which inhere in the text must gather themselves together and travel, as if thrown with substantial velocity, to a unique gestalt locale. The locale, as a congeries of all its component parts, is crystallized, in miniaturized form, in Undulant, and in more representatively newfangled form in Frequencies— the charm, sense of transgression or danger (chaos and violence) thwarted, neutralized, or at least assimilated, and frissons built into a life, unconventional amidst all the conventionality, consecrated against bourgeois pursuits. The poet is not domesticated. Rather, in his travels, the pursuit is for the richness of flight, and the phenomenology of flight, travel, as an end in itself. The poet, as an arrow flying through spaces at any moment enchanted or damned, is in love with the very principle of dynamism perpetuating itself. What gravitas is expressed, what objectivity is reached for, has to do with an understanding reached, through the composition of the book, what human life can offer to this form of consciousness, which craves a mien of the unsettled. Here's how motion or dynamism is achieved, here's how pieces may fall around it. The rogue poet is no one new, to be sure. This rogue poet is not attempting to be new, even if he is, often, inhabiting a new form. What he wants is a new kind of textual voyage, for himself, to mirror and ricochet against, and thus enhance, his fleshly, and cognitive, voyages.

Metaphysics of the Double Sonnet

The metaphysics of the fourteen-line sonnet are not particularly complex ones. Beneath the structural surface of meter, and prosody in general, the fourteen line sonnet both embodies, and represents, a wave on the ocean, and a manifestation of a wave-on-the-ocean dynamic. An impulsive complex in the poet's brain, mostly made, as tradition has defined it, of affective rather than intellectual material, coalesces to hurl itself into brief gestalt shape, as it crashes down in the produced "little song." A sonnet sequence, like Astrophil and Stella, takes the wave-on-the-ocean principle and makes of it a catalog of affective consciousness, an imaginative diary of moods. Shakespeare, Donne, Keats, Milton, Wordsworth, even, later, Edna St. Vincent Millay— all are voices employing the sonnet to index a unique form of sensation— first, the mood (lunar, tidal), then, the will-to-text embedded in the mood, encompassing the reach back to other indexes, other catalogues (especially Keats to Wordsworth and Shakespeare), gaining heft from evidenced histories, before giving way to actual liquidity, in the collision of text produced into precise fourteen line containers. Compression and brevity then seal the simplicity of a literary history which has a unique charm and charisma. This, because when executed skillfully, the wave-on-the-ocean effect creates a correlative sensation in receptive readers, who feel themselves buoyed up, then down again (to more ocean, or the shore), all with a sense of gracefulness and gratefulness that the poet has again moved a bit of water, which can be imagined as a synecdoche for the entire ocean of texts, or books. If the fourteen-line sonnet is a refutation of the discursive, it also dually offers itself to humanize literature, and, implicitly, discourse, with a purification of one kind of (affective) form or essence, against the excesses of the unlimited, of the boundlessness of possible cognitions, built into discourse, which purify discursive possibility in turn.

The invention of a genuine literary form is rare. What appears in the book Something Solid, and which I call a double sonnet— a twenty-eight line poem, one fourteen line sonnet on top of another— must, of necessity, manifest a more complex metaphysic. A wave-on-the-ocean, if it were merely to multiply into two waves on the ocean (two moods), would be redundant. Rather, what a double sonnet is attempting to accomplish is a larger ocean wave (still compressed, still brief), capable of moving in the direction of, even if not able to fully manifest, discourse, and the discursive or intellectual. The wave is built to rise higher, with greater authority, into the air, so that affect can reach around for other tools of the trade or craft— imaginative creativity (metaphor), prosodic effects, perspective shifts, bits of dialogue— and employ them in a redistribution of literary resources, so that the sonnet may take new ground. Now, the sonnet's sense of completion, and the correlative sensation of completion in readers, hinges to something new— a sense, in the middle of the double sonnet, of sitting on the crest of the wave for a few moments, opening up whatever view fits the poem's intentions and impulses. This means that, by the time the wave exhausts itself, the experience does not have to suggest, when interrogated, a paucity of interesting ideas. Rather, interrogation of the double sonnet is designed to reveal a slow-motion version of the original model, so that the reader can assimilate, interrogate, and re-imagine data as the poem itself is experienced, in real time. The metaphysics of the fourteen-line sonnet are then fruitfully complicated, and a unique, complex literary metaphysic is engendered.

To synthesize: are there reasons to prefer the original model? Yes— those who enjoy the game of extreme brevity, of seeing how much data can be compressed into a small space, how much velocity packed into a quick ride, may cling to possibilities inhering in fourteen lines. This extends, also, into the poetry crowd who fetishize tactility, materiality in general, the anti-cognitive. It is not just the original sonnet that holds up the proverbial cross to discourse; some forms of poetry, as an entire enterprise, do an analogous task. Keats, here, is an exemplar. What poetry represents a commercial pursuit follows this predilection through. For those otherwise attuned, who relish the idea and ideal that poetry become attendant upon developed intelligence, the double sonnet should at least be an entity commensurate with the original model. By taking games cramped by tininess, like the volta, as initiated in Renaissance Italy (as, at the conclusion of the octave or the beginning of the sestet, a turn or twist is added to the poem thematically, as a point of emphasis), or Shakesperean or Petrarchan rhyme schemes, and replacing them with freedom to establish novel games, or just to develop whatever topoi are at hand, the double sonnet opens up a region of pure, unmolested literary promise: the strengthened wave, or the slow, sure wave (slow, sure mood), that can stand being freighted with the armatures and artilleries of the new century, and its array of possibilities. Neo-Romanticism manifest.

I. The Nineties

South Street

The girls Chris and I used to drive down to South Street— Erica, Nicole, Dominique—rights/privileges extended to us as Seniors—I see now that, as usual, the glitter/grime of South Street at night (Tower Records big red/yellow sign shone as a talisman, consecrating us) hid something darker, deeper, deadened against our polite passes. As to what world we might've woken to had we known the truth then— I remember bluster, braggadocio (who had who on back seats), I also remember the suave sense we had that these girls, callow as they were, were ours.
We could've used a brain-scanner, or a noose.

Elegy's Ends

Ren and Stimpy were two cartoon imbeciles Kelly doted on. Late at night, I held her in my arms as her idiot roommate snored, in her first-floor room in Runkle Hall, and we quietly sang along to the Ren & Stimpy tunes issuing from her boom-box. So, thy Kingdom Come: I'd left home, lost the monkey on my back, moved on. Cheltenham was done. Lansdale transplant Kelly to me instantly meant that a vast, vital, genuine universe existed and was available to me and my art: no boundaries, no rules, no limits. Even Ren and Stimpy sang out from the opulent side of excitement, opportunity, adventure. The end of the elegies.

Not only were the elegies over, the warpage around our young lives sent Kelly and I down to the Runkle basement several times at that time. We ostensibly hid from Kelly's aforementioned idiot roommate, a big-nosed prig who used to stick that nose in our, and her entire floor's, business.
But what we were actually doing, in those few, spare carpeted rooms (sparsely lit or not lit at all), behind closed doors, was making love. No locks on the doors meant someone could bust in at any moment. We were heedless. This was our only progress towards solvency. The solvency it was, of the shared pursuit of freedom. Adventure, also, thrown in there. No more waking with a virgin's innocence— past Cheltenham, Lansdale.

Black Box

When theater-ace Terry trooped down that staircase into the bowels of the Theater Building, on the fringes of North Halls, I noticed he (it seemed) felt nothing. For me, it was like a plunge into empty nothingness, some infernal realm of inversions; several times I almost fainted. The Black Box theater space was always mobbed on those Thursday nights, not far from midnight, where Terry reigned as secret Outlaw Playwrights king— officious, daring, beneficent or malign, as the mood took him; and as Justine Caskey traipsed past me in the line, vulpine teeth glistening in the fluorescence—

Justine, who we referred to as "Caesar Girl" around North Halls, for making Caesar salads for herself daffily in the dining commons.
I spent an uncomfortable few months obsessed with Ms. Caskey, whose eyes stretched lugubriously across a pinched, cadaverous face. Was she a witch? Did she worship Satan?
Did she know who I was? Yet here, Terry didn't think she could act, and that was all that mattered. As I did my apprenticeship, Terry decided I couldn't act but write. I began to spew out one-acts, working my way assiduously up the ladder to him. A dispensation of God-like power— to see my work staged— was at hand.

Architecture and Levitation

The subliminal nature of architecture—demonstrating, for the human brain, what space is, how it might be saturated, without always obtruding upon our consciousness— as I drove around King of Prussia on those brooding semester breaks, a subtle sense of enchantment grew, hinged to what my future might hold, as one who writes. King of Prussia Mall, Tower Records, random commercial strips with record stores, restaurants, even the bus station where I was claimed at the inception of the break, were all planned and executed to manifest a sense of levitation, and left my brain somewhere in the world Other, forever—

Beaver Avenue

Because I was later to learn what a composition was, it is easy to see, in hindsight, that downtown State College was composed of two parallel streets, College and Beaver Ave. Always festive, even during cold months, to be on Beaver on weekend nights. Beaver featured normal businesses, bookstores, record stores, art supply stores, coffeeshops, interspersed with high-rise apartment towers, in which each apartment came equipped with outdoor porch. That's how the festivities on Friday and Saturday nights got ignited: who the Brits might call punters perched themselves on their porches, beers prominently placed in hands, to rubberneck as action passed on the pavement, particularly girls. Beaver thus, pulsed with action. The posse I was part of from North Halls also included Daniel, my running buddy from Harrisburg suburb Renovo, a glutton for independent rock music, occult adept. The arc of one achingly cold night, towards the end of '95, was disrupted, when, as we approached, we scoped that a skirmish was breaking out between a group side-walked and two stooges hogging a second-floor balcony. The leader suggested that an intervention might be necessary. The second reinforced. Action, including us, stopped. The two pugnacious a-holes who emerged from the first floor doors appeared ready to fight, bringing their beers with them, as though a beer buzz fed their fronts like Gaelic war-paint.

Daniel & I crossed glances, hurried our group past the malarkey.
They hurled a few insults at us, too, Daniel made vulnerable by the quirkiness of a green tweed winter coat. The whole street throbbed with strange, uncentered life. The key to it was, though, that it was alive. Nothing needed to be gracefully arrayed. Cubism, college-style.

Silly Putty

Jennifer: a self-possessed, pixilated individual, stacked like a Playboy bunny, mad as a hatter, refashioning class accordingly, like it was silly putty.
We bonded at the crotch like two young bunnies, just for her to be a mother, just to make silken-soft the bitterness of a broken life in the sticks—the stigma of trailer-trash insignias, which here camouflaged as lower-middle before my naïve eyes.
The pill she was purportedly on was more camouflage— I forgive her now because she had no choice, backed under trailer wheels.
Corn-rows fell on her, and dirty deals. We taught each other Transcendentalism in bed— tantric sessions to cut our teeth on, and cut heads. Including ours.

Dosed

When everything, all daily fodder, shudders inwardly with double, triple, quadruple meanings; every surface seen is incinerated by a sinister beneath; it means a whirligig, Tilt-a-Whirl, or scum inferno has been dosed into your brain.
It gradually dawned on me, as the summer unfolded, that this had become my lot. The kids sharing my sublet were culprits.
Everywhere I looked, spun flame could suddenly scorch me.
Cast up into brutish, bloody air, I could only wait for time to scrape the scum from me again. When I tried to eat, I was chilled by knives having their own aura— what they could do to human flesh chimed out of them, malign. What I was eating was shit. Even as, from the modest security of a carpeted floor on South Atherton Street, Jennifer's future life, and womanly livelihood, were taken care of—

The Scarecrow

He glowered at me, in my acid-cracked, demented dream, from the front of the Strawser trailer, with disdain, as if to spit, "I don't know who you think you are,
Mr. Field, but the place you're in here is the wrong one.
No one here marries outside the maze, the marriage matrix we've made, and woe betide the marriage made on the back of the two-backed beast. You thought we'd be forbearing? That pitch-fork up your ass—that's our forgiveness." He didn't need to say it twice— Jen and I tried to make a reasonable case for ourselves, failed, as the scarecrow sneered. I slugged sleeplessly through several days of this, as Liverpool's cadets collaborated with the scarecrow on a menacing chorus. Jen and I would have to sing someplace else.

Season in Hell: White Candle

Once, if we remembered rightly, our life was a feast at which all hearts opened and all wines flowed. Now, we found ourselves reduced, as the unmade bed in room 510 became a symbol of disorder in our brains, separately and together.
This was our last stand, to and for each other— to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, what forever could mean to a boy and girl, partitioned first from each other like Romeo and Juliet themselves, now free from our clans to not accept our respective conditions. Sleeplessly, we fucked living hell out of each other, with desperate, animal intensity, man and wife welded together in white candle wax, singed into perpetual melt, resolved into loose fluid. The web around you, Jennifer—schemes, starvation—if they never knew the woman you became there and then, in a hotel bed in State College, amid summer throngs— you and I knowing would have to be good enough (me taking twenty-five years to see it), our bodies burning in Elysian fields. O witches, O misery, O hatred, we entrusted nothing to you at all, even as guns were lined up for our excoriation. Walled in on all sides, you left it to me to demonstrate your wifeliness to the world. I am not merely pleased to do so— the white candle of our non-immolation stands in a state of perfect and perfectly lit equilibrium in the corn-fields behind what used to be your trailer, the perfect image of our marriage, war—

September

There was a shooting on campus— a young, militant, girl cadet slaughtered someone from behind a bush on the Hub lawn. The campus panicked briefly, then returned to stupefied stolidness. Word went round that she'd been a waitress at the Diner; I tried to remember if I'd seen her before. Jennifer complained of abdominal cramps, nausea. It had been decided— her family didn't like me. Yet we continued to make love as though our siestas would go on regardless. It would've been useful to know then what I know now— Jennifer was dealt a pregnancy hand which determined her imminent departure, from me and State College, forever, of which I knew nothing.
It was not for us to choose anything. Or even something.

The Rustic Inscrutable

Carrie, a pretty brunette with bag-edged eyes, was another obvious small-town siren, and was stationed, strangely, right across from Jen in Leete Hall. My young mind was naïve about such things. Carrie bothered to flop me, sloppily, from a murky marriage into her bed, oblivious as I was to my own confusion. Nights knee-deep in discomfort, Carrie my accomplice, I slipped into nothingness and no-man's land. Jen and I had the shotgun marriage ended for us, and oh what a shotgun it was— a loaded one. That much, I sort of knew.
But Jen had disappeared off-campus completely. Carrie and Jen both knew some score, in a game which had yet to be introduced to me. My part was to be passed from hand to hand— a shared asset, jinxed by the rustic inscrutable.

Something gloomy about small towns, small town girls: macabre undercurrents follow them around, amidst the farms, lakes, forests, extended foliage.
The grim reaper likes forests as much as cities, and the naked flesh of small-town nubiles is as Hawthorne'd as an even more abject Hester Prynne.
Cobwebs, soot, mud, grease, blood— it's all smeared on the two-backed beast, when and if it happens there. Now, it had happened to me twice running— suburban, well-situated, unused to being blood-drenched, ripe to hit my head on rocks. Jennifer made an abrupt exit to cover the anguish. Carrie waited darkly to be punished. I ploughed through fields, into deep water.

Trooper

La Tazza was a coffee-shop in Manayunk, where I was stationed with Chris one autumn, semester-break night in '97. We'd been through a brief, coffee pick-up room, down a stairway, which guided you narrowly into a steep-ceiling'd, spartan, red-painted basement.
Jeremy's posse, all in army-jackets, picked us up, and we all wound up in an apartment, steep-ceiling'd again, on Main Street. I didn't know Jeremy well enough yet that night to understand that he was uncharacteristically quiet. I was to learn, that by then he had lost control of this cabal, and blew in the wind. The poems sat, wrapped in a dossier-file presentation, at Villanova, as they lay also, in Jeremy's brain, medals of honor from his days as a real, poetry punch-drunk army trooper.

I envision— Jeremy walks down Main Street. In his hands is a copy of "d" magazine, which he hopes to consign anywhere.
Rather, he hopes to dump in the river, a few blocks down. The fame he wants is fast, or nothing. He always thought he would make it someday. If he doesn't, it's not his fault.
Perhaps he should move to New York, after all. Or teach, tutor, bartend, give up the architecture routine. His brain is a jumble of low and high. It's worth something to him, to be big. Why starve? Why play pauper? It's true: unless he feels royal, royally protected, he can't write. Main Street dead-ends: it's ruthlessly midnight. When Manayunk would lead to Center City, Jeremy was destined to find me, not backing up third-world, New Jersey shenanigans, waiting in a coffee-shop, to get punch-drunk on poetry.

Defiance

The road is slick with moisture. If they hydroplane, you can say goodbye to my own future life. Rather more distressingly, they're both high, as she holds on tight. Her long, slender arms make the necessary circle around his ample waist; long, lank blonde hair blows in the breeze. Yet she's quiet at Penn Crest, stubbornly resistant to attempts to draw her out. She's his girl Friday more than wife. Real marriage hovers in the future as a homing beacon, against the ravages of too many deal-related parties, intermediaries imploring her to step back, climb on his loaded lap: her one and only.
Body/soul unity haunts her waking hours, a vision inherited from the Renaissance shakes her dope-addled brain.
Statuesque, she carries a blown-glass bowl, rolling papers.

The most formal future comrade migrates from flat to flat, the length of Manhattan; saved from school's repetitive rigors, yet awkward against others more normal. As is often the New York spin, there is no getting close. Kids come and go. She's got the pluck, as is ascertained, to paint what she wants. The most difficult forms (portal-ways, planar spaces) flow easily out of her. She's then a weird, worrisome windup doll to defy the lightness of touch used to lighting up the New York art firmament. She's a gem for someplace else, not dust-binned yet, but close. Half-noticing, she also imposes a posture of defiance on her life— tiny, half-dyke.
Day-to-day, the grind is to take the advanced lights, find somewhere to migrate with them. The vision behind is crystal.
I was destined to defy the motorbike with paper piles, marriages. Right?

Nessy

Somewhere, over the rainbow, there he stood, before Mary, with all ducks lined up in a row, everything she could need or want: Lord Byron.
When Mary casts herself past John, or, later, me, who she sees is always Byron. What she sees attendant on the crown prince of the Satanic School never changes: big motorcycle, big penis, big drugs. Motorcycle, of course, in its nineteenth century equivalent. Not to mention big brains.
The man who has, and is, everything. Neither John nor I could ever be good enough. Mary is often quiet, but the monster in her of awesome greediness leers at the thought she should submit to anyone but the mad, bad, dangerous to know one, who reigns supreme in her heart. Mary wears contacts, of course.

When she reads, she uses specs. It could never be guessed, she thinks, that her own personal Loch Ness Monster, of ferocious appetite for every kind of experience, could ever be spotted beneath all the mutable water.
With her Nessy lurks the sense of using people like John does, as vassals and vessels, and luring useful ones to their doom. Willy-nilly, she reads, and has imagination around reading. I had her, before I had her. Even if I did turn out to be rather a Plato's Cave shadow-play version of her beloved, who was (she never forgot) another January birthday, another eccentric rebel.
She liked Shelley, too. He was a demon-conjuror.
As for me, I did what I could. I scored as Keats.

Kill Or Be Killed

As was true for Abby and I, Mary spent her adolescence deciding to be an all or nothing kind of babes. What was being reached for was a kind of life unseen in America before— as a painter, not just another parochial American mediocrity, weaned on parochial American trash, but a dweller in the higher, thinner air of the most developed kind of painterly formality. Yet not just formalism, as Philly had got a bad reputation for, but art that bespoke of the highest level of confessional honesty. Art that completely and absolutely expressed a definite, distinctive self. All this wrapped in a world which granted her all the sex, drugs, and clothing a woman could want. If, that is, you were like her, and refused to settle for what she would call the declasse. As when anyone among the very normed out human race attempts to do anything new, stakes around this individual were very high to push all those individual impulses out the window, and force timid, contrite compliance. So when Mary ploughs through her Nineties days, her house becomes an explosively powder-kegged battlefield, where Mary fights for the shining beacon of that liberated life she so deserves. The Harju house in Media, three sisters and two parents, is on the class cusp between middle-of-the-middle and upper-middle. It's a semi-rich girl's house. Everything about the house reeks of complete, totalized WASP normalcy, Republicanized "family values," semi-devout (also) religiosity. Four bedrooms on the big second floor, a living-room den and basement-den, generically furnished, generically arranged. Kill or be killed.

Laird

Whatever interest you might have in watching a mid-level rock band onstage in, say, vintage film from the 1970s, and in whatever sense it might be in the interests of justice to watch the bass guitarist follow the lead and rhythm guys into, say, Smoke On The Water, I would like it to be known that because it happens to be Mary's father with the Fender Precision, any record kept of wars in that particular family would need to duly note that said father was more moderate than might at first be thought.
Try, again, to chart the journey from Smoke On The Water to issues of God, carpeting, mutual funds, acceptable tax evasions, unacceptable tax evasions, acceptable moral lassitude, unacceptable moral lassitude, and the rest, and understand that in the end, a free-spirited daughter, to the long-hair with the Fender Precision, was not that much of a curse or a plague on the house, even if her disruptiveness made his days miserable, because, more than her mother, he understands her. He had his years when he tried to live as fully and freely as he could, and was then, in expected fashion, coy about it, but if Mary got out of that house in one piece, it's because a firm, masculinized, restraining hand held back the two major female assailants, the Me and the Mini-Me.

More than she could ever know, Laird was a secret friend to her.

Inheritance

Inheritance, in Mary's house, was a funny game. Money, as usual in the suburbs, in the air, but also values, value systems on offer. As a life in art, sex, and drugs beckoned, Mary, as a child and early adolescent, could find little that would sustain her. Laird and Bethany were not exactly Jesus-freaks— they did not proselytize, and were restrained in how they expressed their religiosity— this, including semi-impositions at worst on their three daughters— but a Christian Right backbone was there, inhering. Mary's quirk— a sense of having fallen in love with Jesus, first as a character in the Bible, then as the subject of Renaissance art— was taken to be a source of amusement to Laird, and a substantial "not to the point" to Bethany, who waited for Mary to walk a certain chaste walk she would've wanted for her. The chaste walk was a no go— Mary was willful about charting her own course— but Mary's fascination with Jesus never left her. Mary's Renaissance wholesomeness was embodied, she felt, by Jesus, whose soul had to condescend to take on flesh, or be made meat. The key point for Mary, which lit up the Renaissance for her, was that the indissoluble bond between flesh and spirit found its ultimate avatar in Jesus Christ. His body was his soul, his soul was his body. The Pieta always brought tears to Mary's eyes; Jesus left a beautiful corpse indeed. The soul could never leave the flesh; matter contains, embodies, sustains the inanimate; human flesh has the possibility of Holiness built into it, too. Mary was not meant for renunciation, or mortification; but all her many indulgences, including ones built into our own matrimonial bed, take as a starting point the Renaissance ideal, starting from who Jesus was, that an unembodied soul and un-souled body are equally unacceptable.

Sister Souls

Can it be that, even if the right concession is made—the middle rides bitch— there is some luster to holding up the fort, hemmed in on both sides? Whines on one side, fisticuffs on the other. Mary was a bullying kid, whose quietness at PennCrest was explicable because as a freshman she was adopted by upperclassmen, never recovered her wits. Grass, pills, and general craziness didn't help. She was someone they could play games with. Move down three grades, there stands Ruth before us. Mary and Ruth had so much the same soul, yet so many differences, too— similitude in dissimilitude— Wordsworth didn't know the half of it.
Ruth, who would grow to the same height as Mary, but ached, part of the time, with brunette practicality—was not a systematic derangement of the senses kind of girl, and the movement from Romanticism to Symbolism takes us into their heart of darkness. As Ruth would say, even at a young age, Ruth had her version of Romance, her version of Symbolism, more grounded than her grandstanding sister. The ferocity felt, of a need to express something real, was there. Ruth, as a general rule, supported Mary's exhibitionism in the house, against Laurie and the two parents, because she knew her sister meant it about expressing something in a real way. Yet, as the Nineties rolled towards the Aughts, Ruth was caught in a maelstrom of aimlessness, trying to weld practical instincts to creative impulses. Never subordinate to Mary, always supporting her, but wary of Mary's…a hem…lifestyle choices, too much a roulette wheel. Sister souls.

Consort, Concubine, Wife

Symmetry, asymmetry— John and I were born same year.
All the same, I was never quite the high school goomba he was.
The eyes that scoped out the leggy blonde freshman, had lines running that could bring her to him instantly. That, he did.
His goomba-ish instinct was correct— she could be bound and fastened to him. He knew, in a part of him which could just know things, that she hated her home, and was looking for a way to escape. She gave off the right distress vibes, and her tallness and lankiness looked good next to him. He, himself, was big and burly, looked like he could be a linebacker for PennCrest. Yet the freak-show started, beyond his operational abilities as a dealer, with the idea, another abstruse one, that he was an art-connoisseur, an aesthete. He passed time with the Beats, lounged around with Waterhouse coffee table books, and used his bulk to intimidate, as any dealer would, but didn't feel like taking any shit for his flitty idiosyncrasies. The Gothic nature of his own house had, again, an eerie sense of symmetry with me, my own house by that time— a mother and son, alone. Cultured people, the two of them, though John can't always hide that the deals routine is high on his list of priorities. So, this is how the John and Mary dance begins— a semi-marriage, the consummation of which happens in drugs, the social presentation of which happens in deals, dealing situations, the idiosyncrasies of which have to do with art, and a proclivity for painting Mary has that is encouraged by John. Even as he plays with her faculties, night by night, by throwing things at her to take. Mary gets used to life among minions. Her position is, would have to be, a high one, but these two are seldom alone. Consort, concubine, wife: who knew?

High Ceilings

And was it accursed to the eons, for a whole lot of people, that it should be that way? I am thinking of the January night in Logan Square, when Mary and I first went nuptial. That it was so raw, so real, so about hungry people being able to feed, and being so against the starving, threadbare multitudes, lost in mutilated lives— accursed to the eons? It was everything we'd have to pay for, that's for sure. But the way the Nineties worked, Mary and I both found time to become educated semi-avatars at the big fleshly discipline. My main route or thoroughfare was that, right on the surface. State College saw me, in fact, emerge as a sexualized, not really scamp, sub-scamp or post-scamp. Mary's route was more twisted, around John, and into other turf. Guys in her business who had a sense of mercy for the artist in her, were willing to go the distance with her, teach her the ropes, bring her up to speed, so that even then Byron for her had to be a composite. The sense of anonymity around her coming of age was clouded also by intoxication, by associating the carnal with the clouded torpor of being high. She never talked too much, in later times, about the sense of pedagogical interest she inspired. Yet it was clear, by the enfranchised January night, that she knew herself in a way womanly, not girlish, and that the rigors of mattress-thumped satiety were accompanied for her with familiarity. Not to mention, also, entitlement, the sense that she deserved a physical self conversant in ecstasy, well-roundedness. Houses with high ceilings.

Wake and Bake

Approaching pleasure as something formalized— a discipline—with tools, appurtenance items, tricks of the trade, regimens—this, Mary added to her repertoire in the Nineties, too. John was a real Epicurean. The fine art or craft-skill of waking and baking— to greet the morning with a joint, bowl, or spliff—gave Mary an edge to understanding from John, in the way or manner their marriage worked, that this right or privilege was now hers. She'd earned it. So, wake and bake they would, whether in Media, where they still started part of the time, or Amherst, where John was enrolled doing college courses, while I myself was ensconced in University Park. New England winters no fun to wake and bake, they would have to wait for summer, as I later would, to reap the full harvest of the exquisite, delicate armature of a righteous morning buzz. By the time Mary and I were ourselves ensconced in Logan Square and West Philadelphia, John had handed to me, through Mary, the same passkey. On the enfranchised mornings set aside to be voluptuary— not too many, because even then we both had full responsibility loads— but nonetheless, Mary's eastern exposure window let morning sunlight in, and we could light up, feel like God's children, in a pagan or wiccan nature celebration consecrating our flesh to the flesh of the earth. If you make the addition of carnality to my marriage with Mary, past what she had enjoyed with John, we could take the morning buzz, on the handful of times it happened this way, to such an absolutely lofty plateau of intense, formalized pleasure, that only Olympus could do us justice. As usual, the bugs of the world watched, ready to rip us to shreds. They would, indeed, later be allowed to do so, with gusto. But we had burrowed so far into space, the universe, that none of it mattered. The mountain still got built.

Home

The hook was baited, for the fish to understand something hidden. However much Manhattan basked in the media spotlight, as the home of all cultural East Coast action, the portal-ways, planar spaces, advanced compositions, heady coloration schemes, which tumbled from her teeming head, could have no home there. Manhattan, media spotlight or not, had no recourse but to be dumb.
Inauguration beneath the surface to just that, the part of life against stage-lights, but Abby simply had no choice. She was the threat to an established cultural order. No Byronic hang-ups, just a pair of the most crystalline eyes ever bequeathed to a human being, forced to leave what had been her home. Broadway, where she had served, proved to be no help. Musical theater was third-world lechery, as was Manhattan itself, so that the fish forced herself to flow into a new, foreign city: all buildings, no Broadway. The girls who were her girls were everywhere. She hoped. And lucked out, because crafting hands molded the situation into a form sculptured to please a ferocious appetite for queer life. No queerness lacking in Philadelphia. Just the sense of a new kind of flow, sense of order, hierarchy: permissions to be granted, privileges to be earned. Always the thought that Manhattan could be retreated into. Abby found that when she bit down on Philadelphia, the planar spaces expanded themselves into something epic, unprecedented, as did a sense that compositions announced solvency. Home.

Broad Street

You'd think Abby might've fallen in love with her at first sight. Was Abby really the fall in love at first sight type? Later, I was to learn: not really. Fierce life-force energy, into giddy humor, different kinds of insanity, but a cool customer nonetheless where her emotions for other people were concerned. Still, it must've been something at first sight— intrigue, a sense that the right innuendo phrases around the right drugs were being used, the right painters referenced, the right hinges also to interesting guys (just to model for them, of course), the right Center City mindset (like Manhattan, but warmer, realer, more human), so that Abby was hooked on Mary in a cool five minutes.
Two rebels, also, against PAFA, against any imperative dictating their art but the most honed, refined internal compass.

Indeed, Abby's with her, not threatened at all. Mary towers seven annoying inches over her and is, as Abby learns to her dismay, always in control of her appetite, so that a plump Mary is unthinkable. But later that day, when the first communal joint gets smoked, Abby feels Philadelphia fall into place for her as no action-disappointment at all, Mary herself a whirligig to pick her up, set her in a new place. It seems inevitable to Abby that they become inseparable for a while.
When she sees Abby's work for the first time, it's Mary who feels slightly threatened. What an eye! Undeniably genius in her brain around spatial precisions, divisions. Even on the first halcyon day, Abby's temper flares several times, when already-controversial names are mentioned. A fireball!
The long, lean queen surveys the picture: no way out. Broad Street.

Continental

Maya, Saskia, Kristen— if you happened to be a girl painter, and wanted to be in the shit the right way at PAFA in those days, the right names were the right names. PAFA, it turns out, were no shrinking violets about turning out their version of ladies-of-the-night, and now Mary and Abby were initiated into rites of passage in which obeisance was done to the coven that ruled a bunch of campus roosts.
Maya, Saskia, and Kristen shared in common a sense of worldliness, of knowing Europe; of having come from the right kind of money to have done Europe and everywhere else the right way; a conviction that Philadelphia could work as a European city of note; and a sense of art that, like Mary and Abby's, lingered on form as an agent of class rather than an impossibility, as in Manhattan; a distaste, as it were, for the formless. But beneath the surface ethos of a coven destined to guiding light Mary and Abby's first years in Center City, the real sense of class and distinction was about drugs. Maya, Saskia, and Kristen would certainly never reduce painting to a mere front; but at the end of the day, when all was said and done, what they were dealing was who they were. They attempted to deal, as Gaetan later would, with the class and distinction of European dealers in Philadelphia, and the ring of painters around them would have to evince similar class for them to be happy. Mary and Abby zoomed into view for them as two already-seasoned recruits.

Mary, leading Abby, wanted a line on coke, and got it. From her first months at PAFA, she would hide bits of blow around her studio, sneak off from anywhere for a secret gummer. "Continental."

Collage

As the blonde painter built towards a caterwauling climax of charismatic presence, her brain constructed itself all over again. Everything in Mary's past which could be used to self-mythologize would be used—that was taken for granted— but the tack taken was about a jumble of dynamic elements, never needing to coalesce into coherence, which would make her as larger than life as she wanted to be. The unfathomable sense, after this many years, of taking the raw materials Mary employed and attempting to understand what was real, what wasn't, can be easily replaced by understanding that grist for the mill was grist for the mill for Mary then— anything went. True dynamism meant that if half-stories became full stories and vice versa, that was fine, as long as the whirling dervish effect was achieved, manifesting the Mary-as-hurricane she wanted to be. Whether her father really was a drunken lout in private, a philanderer, or even a lover of his daughters, no one really needed to know. The serpent of that story unleashed itself, and then self-consumed. Mary as someone who, in drunken and drugged stupor, had been hit by a car somewhere near Media, also disgorged itself in the melee, along with the sense of enfranchisement around being hospitalized for general insanity. Mary had been propositioned by street-kids in Spain; had trod the boards in Massachusetts as a professional hippie, on a New England commune; had random sexual encounters in sleeping bags in airports; ran away from home several times as a teenager; was a pioneer in the discovery of oxycontin; was an uber-electrical storm. The myth was a collage.

Credit

Some of the Nineties shenanigans I remain bemused by are what Abby and I, as a kind of brother-sister duo, forgot to do. Like learn to dress. Eventually, as I prowled State College in black leather pants, purchased on a special expedition to Center County Mall, I was following through the dictum that my clothes needed to be not completely boring. I even added a large, unwieldy Celtic Cross, purchased on Beaver Avenue, for the same reason.
But, mostly, the plain jane reigned. That went also for Abby, who was not called to dress any special way, and had a way that stuck with her of just throwing on whatever.
Miss H was a different story, and cultivated a mentality that her work as a painter could be consolidated and magnified by her toweringly tasteful fashionista insight. Working with what she had— long, thin, graceful limbs, no particular bust, blue eyes mid-level blue, not pale, but larger than average, sandy, lank blonde hair that made a whirling dervish package deal of the whole enterprise of herself— she crafted a regimen of possible selves, put them into motion. Preppie Mary, hair in a bun, was a funny look for her, inverting her expertise in sex and drugs, but showing off that the limbs still performed the right way when packaged conservatively. The flower-shirted, midriff-bared hippie or flower-child look, blonde mane loosened, forced a lot of male animals to grunt, proof that she could get around the tiny bust issue. When Mary would add a jade pendant to an average outfit, or a sun dress, she was saying that it was within her power to take the ordinary, make it extraordinary, if the pendant was properly placed. You might or might not give her credit for it.

Installation

So, there we were in the years. As of four months left in the century, I would settle in for a very long stay in Logan Square. Abby and Mary, still in Center City, had their eyes on rustic, scenic West Philadelphia as a semi-permanent port of call. Who Abby and Mary were at PAFA is determined by an understanding of complexities which made PAFA's very existence precarious. The image of PAFA to Europe was sanguine.
Europeans had no problem with painters learning, employing form, painting with discipline, rather than the formless Manhattan meandering which made necessary Abby's escape. But the East Coast media found form, any artistic form, corny, & as of the turn of the century, the kill the country with stupid culture press-game was still operative.

Thus, PAFA was split between affiliations, down lines which suggested rocks, hard places. The solution for PAFA, as of the century turning, was to demonstrate for the media compliance with their all-consuming, stomach-turning kill game, by granting prizes, favored status at PAFA to students working in the disciplines Abby and Mary thought dumb, and corny right back— installation art, videos, conceptual gestural art, anything but real painting.
So that, Abby & Mary were true hipsters at PAFA about drugs, but forced to settle for mid-level status as students, while the installation crowd got the prizes, plaudits.
Abby, in particular, whose raw sense of painterly giftedness outweighed the entire institution, including Andrew Wyeth, was none too pleased, but her life was a fast-moving train. Move on.

Scorecard

Amusing, after many eternities, to write a scorecard of similarities and differences for Mary and Abby. Amusing, because the one being skinny but huge, strapping, the other abbreviated, made them obvious non-twins, non-siblings.
In many ways, and as would be expected, Mary was more straightforwardly womanly than Abby was. Part and parcel of Mary's womanly wiles was the sense of mystery built into everything she did. Mary was, indeed, difficult to fathom, fathomless, and combinations of pointed remarks & silence conveyed for her what she wanted, in any given situation. Was Mary mistress of herself? Her mysterious amours worked, then, before I was on the scene, to create a sense that everything about her was eroticized. Was the small bust a guy-deterrent? Not on your life. Mary actively employed her hips, legs, flanks, and not infrequently bared midriff, to create an impression of intrigue, womanly mystery. When she wore midriff shirts in summertime, an occasional besotted pedestrian would stop in the street. She had it. Yet whatever action was there, whoever she was seen with (and she was seen with many), all outward hints were a strain to hear, passed sotto voce. I was later to learn, that Mary alone, even as spouse, still thrived on the intrigue, the spookiness, of mystery, of leaving things unsaid.

Mary's sense of drama was cloak and dagger, and the sense of peripeteia, for her many lovers, was an engorged one. Yet Mary was bewitchingly about parts— physical, emotional, psychological—that knew how dances of the flesh worked, only too well.
When she was in harmony with herself, emptiness & fullness cojoined in her in rapture, ecstasy. The painting-brain mystery was Abby's.

The Ecstasy

If you fast forward to it, as a remote vision of human happiness that was granted to us then—Mary and I hold hands, laying on my living room floor, read Donne's The Ecstasy to each other—not to mention the extermination of physical boundaries which followed our recitation—you can find the root of it, in both of us, from a sense of entitlement about our lives, which meant that whatever was ours to have and hold, would and could become inalienable to us. In other words, a sense of the tenacious around the idea of achieving any type or form of ecstasy we might be able to. We both, subconsciously, prepared ourselves for each other by being unwilling to stint ourselves.

The womanly part of Mary, past and around the sublimity which animated the creative sectors of her brain, already had so much of Jennifer in it— the flame-headed sense of liking the different, the new, the bizarre— the desire for complete, totalized sensory immersion in an ecstatic present— the passion for the experience of ravishment, including willingness to submit to a man, however humble, to make it happen— but above all a sense that was simpler, of seeing what you want in the world and taking it, dammit.
Jennifer christened me ready for Mary. John, of course, was hardly a doppelganger to me. No physical resemblance, but another daredevil, another holy flake, another would-be artist, and another sense of entitlement around the simple issue to thine own self be true. The ecstasy, past lust, chiseled into us.

Patrol

It was too low or too high for me for it to be that, by my junior year of high school, mid-evening could find me already with a pot buzz on. Junior year was, in fact, a deranged congeries of worthless elements making it so that I was desperate to escape my day-to-day life very much. I had gained a bunch of weight, was doing poorly at school. It would have to be that the self-salvaging came later. It did. That night, however, I floated aimlessly to a party in Elkins Park, in a house at the top of the hill behind Sousan Pharmacy, Elkins Park Square across Old York Road.
It was amusing to see how N. reacted to stoned Adam—laughing at me at the wrong times, not understanding that it was not her grandiloquence, or Zen mastery of my psychology that made me skittish, but just the fact that I had cannabis rattling around in my brain. I was sitting in an elongated window casement at the front of the house, facing away from Old York Road. I looked over at the front door incidentally, and John and Mary were standing there, watching Cheltenham heads of state hold court. They were almost certainly stoned, too, as PennCrest representatives moving forward to extend their domains. John, of course, was older, my age, and the leader. Mary, his lanky blonde consort, was quiet. Yet, after all this time, and after all is said and done, somewhere in the universe there is a sense of bemused satisfaction that when Mary and I made eye-contact for the first time, we were both wasted. I wound up in a troupe of idiots that night (dead of winter), patrolling the borderline between Elkins Park and Wyncote. Domain redefinitions.

Marathons

For burgeoning degenerates, as I was then, it was interesting to learn, my cleaned-up senior high school year, that a well-run cross-country race, however excruciating, also delivers an eight-hour heroin buzz—runner's high. Over at PennCrest, Mary was already busy running track, rather than cross-country, at which she excelled, even as it forced her to eat entire dinners, and even desserts. We were already, without knowing it, an odd couple, each as odd as the other, because the zig-zag of high school athletics to European classicism, and hyped-up athleticism to drugged lethargy, was built into us, hard-wired, by (also) a Philadelphian and American society tolerant enough to let us go our merry, mold-defying, not locked-down way. Where the running showed up later, right in the middle of things, is in the sense of fitting right in to the physiology of the big city, making an easy adjustment, as it were, to Center City, being able to handle city-life without looking back. Days that ran on and on, into nights which also ran on and on, were fine for us. The stamina we needed was there. Where Abby amassed the same stamina-energy is anyone's guess. Even in the vaunted recreational sport of communal marijuana smoking, on and on we raced, bowl after bowl, spliff after spliff. Skinny as a rail, interesting also to learn that Mary took up a lot of space. She was big.

Those long, graceful limbs cleared a substantial path around her, so that the space she needed was her own. And, coyness aside, the on and on was true for us in bed, too. All of which meant that the days and nights we had together were not brief. Marathons.

Harrisburg

I'd always noticed the pronounced, large squareness of her forehead, giving her a thoughtful (philosophical?) look. Then, the cascade of black waves, thicker than average neck, medium build. Tall— strapping, even. She paced in front of me, my cheap luggage, as blistering sunlight singed the Harrisburg bus terminal, without acknowledging me directly. I knew for a fact— she was not an undergraduate at PSU.
She could only have been here, in Central Pa, tracking me.
The years of my childhood and adolescence in Cheltenham, she'd been an indifferent presence. I had, as I well knew, been a reprobate to her and her kith and kin, but for abstruse reasons. As of this summer day, I continued not to care. Except to say, that the School District and its minions should have known better, belabored zero into sub-zero—

"as if, Adam; as if I had any idea how to handle you, or us, or what Cheltenham had turned into by then. You: always special, always different, always such a fierce disruption against our lives.
Remember— I never liked you much anyway.
There's no room for special people where I come from. What's special is the order of who gets placed where when, and why. So, as I followed you out that stupid door, it's with no special anything. Philosophy? Where I come from, it's this: where you come from is who you are, whether you like it or not. You were lower than us, lower, and still are, you little shit—and that luggage you had was pretty cheap, wasn't it?"

Abington Bar

We were drinking in an Abington bar; I was smoking Parliament Lights. I misunderstood why dagger-looks were being thrown in our direction. I was supposed, I later did understand, to not be there anymore. If I was there, I would have, manifestly, to be in rough, over-shifted shape. But I went on sipping the rum and Coke, oblivious, only noting that semester breaks usually managed to avoid the delirium tremens of my CHS years, but not always.
When Chris and I were stripped of armor, as we were compelled to be here, Chris fell back on the sangfroid of one too hype on a possession vibe to register anything, here in the darker, dust-binned depths of the Philly 'burbs.
He owned the place, for him; I disowned the place, for me.

Amenity

In a world in which all are permanently beset, an amenity is an amenity is an amenity. Incredible, how charmed it was to wade in the warm waters (currents, undercurrents) of The Coffee Cellar, walk-down wedged, with a pizza parlor, beneath a side-street connecting College and Beaver. The Cellar had the audacity, in select circumstances, for select attendees, to offer goo-balls over the counter. Whatever a goo-ball is now, then it was this: hash baked into a ball of raw, hand-hardened cookie dough. Efforts made, the goo-ball's slow-burn magic carpet ride offered fantasies fulfilled, for heady college town residents, especially on temperate nights in spring, autumn.
Would-be seer of visions I was, I perceived no insolence.

New Year's Eve

Youth's privilege is to be in love with life.
I was in love with life that night, too— the crush of strange kids in a white-painted, unfurnished Abington bungalow, movements made by us towards more weed.
We sat on a curb outside in the frost, planned more mischief. Then, someone else's wood-paneled porch, weed introduced, clearly laced with Benzedrine, to move us up a few more notches. The whirligig around Chris and his Abington crew never faltered, on the road to that systematic derangement of the senses I told Chris so much about. The night's volta was just me back in the family kitchen again at five a.m., ploughing through several bowls of breakfast cereal. I then slept for three days, not yet wise-ass enough to know what I'd celebrated.

Central Pennsylvania

My young writing life: a solitary hike up Kilimanjaro (apprentice, as I was, to no one specifically). I wrote and wrote until Kilimanjaro was scaled, Mont Blanc, and Snowdon. The graciousness of State College revealed itself in sublets: South Atherton Street, West Nittany Avenue. I surveyed my papers, which for me were drenched in the ecstasy of tears, terror, and tremors transcended; and charted Central Pennsylvania as a mighty mind— a million shades of green. For a few months, this little college town was representatively, legitimately my possession. I consumed College Avenue as though it were nitrous, my diploma made of universe, or the heaven of poetry's gravel-paths. Much of me would remain where this breakthrough occurred, could never change. Nature's way.

Shotgun Kiss

Party swirling around us in waves, there it was: a shotgun kiss. I had no rejoinder but to say thanks.
Arcane, what you'd done, with other kinds of shotguns, to allow it to happen, my dear. To find out, an eternity later, that you were writing too, shuttling back and forth between countries, over-extended enough that publication had to be a non-thought— I never need doubt you were a tragedy (suicide blonde) foisted on everyone, without anyone knowing.
The Outlaws were clueless in your direction, as was I.
Were you a Ruth, or a Tammy? Everywhere you looked: blood, dirt, feces, dope, pockets full of nothing.
As an editor-to-be, you knew me as a layaway plan.
The overlap of two mouths: effectual blowing of smoke.

Perfect

The poster of Monroe, dousing herself in cologne, was you, yourself, again— had to be perfect, as you said; as Jennifer was you, yourself again, perfectly, as didn't need to be said, couldn't have been anyway, then.
I imagine you, wandering down to that dank basement, with a sense of symmetry in your brain about what had been, would be. By the time it was time, your hair had darkened, but the core of you remained bright, as bright as it had been in the house on South Atherton Street. It was your turn to cut down the middle, offer up your vision of perfection to a man who appeared to you more than a curiosity— sharper.

The shock of making love amid a sea of paper, piles upon piles— my own vision of perfection had arrived, on the wings of the Symbolists, as they were me, myself, again, etc. The space we were able to inhabit that autumn, a from-here armistice season against Hell, couldn't last, but we didn't need it to. Rather, if we cut into each other at the right angles, a fossil shell imprint would be left on State College, & the whole world; pungent, starkly ravishing enough to last our own un-warped version of forever. So it has been for me. As to where & what you cut down the middle of, as we speak— we'll see if I'm pure enough to know anymore, Emily. Maybe.

Emily's Voodoo

Emily's voodoo: an invocation of lascivious lawlessness, a garden of secret green. From my second-floor sublet on West Nittany Avenue, I'm sure she looked out at autumn State College with a mystical sense that her spell was being cast: hydrochloride pot, cigarettes, and the rest that was her, splayed out in a posture that, somewhere, she had already mastered. The spell was against all the run-in-circles crew, "sororisluts," footballers, frat-packs, the anti-human, anti-humane. What sutured our skin together ripped them to shreds in Emily's mind, cast out from my black mattress.
In State College, the playbook of human savagery against raw reality was ornery, but could be contravened.

To Happy Valley

The State College townie kids, bound to Happy Valley, got their kicks where they found them, gave off an air of ennui shot with doom (human life having granted them no escape valve), yet were accommodating to me. On what it means to look around a small town, and know that it is everything to you, encompasses all you are, Lords over you confining curses: to trip with these kids was to understand these limitations, the magic and the agony. Lisa smirked, skinny in her boots, hair cut short but for the one fringe over her left eye, and passed me water for the E high—

Lisa— after twenty years, the bathroom, you remember, in The Coffee Cellar, was all black, with a wide mirror.
Stoned, I dragged you (sweet sixteen) in there to see if I could kiss you, wrapped in black leather pants; you banged in two-inch-high boots, tawny hair-fringe there, over your eye. I got the kiss; we ambled out hand in hand; wound up back in again. You made me vow to you something I can't remember. How townie girls talked— I'd nod, get lost.
But the womb-space was complete—we were safe, ascendant into space, hopeless—

Elsewhere

Even in the depths of adolescent degeneracy, I didn't think of my conquest of Washington Square Park as anything that important. It had seemed simple, to me, to master the deals system around the park. Mastering said system meant that if I wanted to score a twenty-bag, at any time, I could.
The action around Washington Square Park was pretty lowly stuff; my entire life in Manhattan turned out to be pretty lowly. Rather than a small, cozy college town, what we had here was a fiery furnace, a big, ugly juggernaut, eagerly ripping anything or anyone to shreds whose ass wasn't completely covered. I somehow managed to salvage for myself a bedsit in Park Slope, Brooklyn, after crashing for a while on the Upper West Side and the East Village.

My meandering day to day life, between looking for straightforward work, looking for work in theater, trying to get published, and haphazardly recording music, was a narrow tunnel, over the course of that year, and if I was going to survive, it wasn't here. I found Manhattan to be Deathsville. One day that spring, I was doing my usual aimless park routine, and someone was following me. She sat on the bench, on the perimeter of the park, to see what I was doing. She would've noted I was even skinnier than usual. My eyes, round and brown, reflected a side angle that tilted slightly to reveal them as loopy, alien-like. Could be painted. The life-force energy was still there. This boy, another artist, had a future. Elsewhere.

II. Aughts Philly

The Painter

The compact red book I ran around with: Crowley's Book of the Law. I was goaded into knowledge that a reckoning was at hand.
An archetypal Goddess had manifested as a tactile reality in my life. An image had been seared into my mind; a painting called The Vessel; it was hers, and yet I was a married man. The only path forward that tempestuous autumn of '01 was to cheat. The book laid down a gauntlet of what it meant to act in the world with a genuine sense of destiny; to be a man who had the mettle to be a real force of nature. She knew, my wife, that I had been possessed, and that winds were blowing me in a new direction, towards the forbidden.

I had, it seemed to me, no choice. The night I spent with the painter, in a studio in PAFA, I discovered what it meant to have a hinge to true will about matters of the heart. She kept paintings there, of Dionysus and Apollo, and she would make me a myth, too. We shared red wine that had the effect of being blood between us; our chalice was the air, the sound of water pipes late at night in an old building, darkened corridors meant to hold only us, bathrooms which could be used as portal-ways into starry worlds. As I gathered steam, I felt the book hover in the air as well, a piece of text writ in boiling blood, pummeling towards spring.

The Studio

The vista which then opened was one I never could've anticipated in the Nineties— the PAFA campus was set as a series of jeweled buildings smack in the center of Center City Philadelphia, a few blocks from City Hall. Mary was then still in enough good standing to maintain her own studio on campus. I had to sign in as a guest on the ground floor every time I visited. The room was a large rectangle, and the elongated back wall was one big window, looking out on the western progression of Cherry Street, towards Broad. Until Mary and Abby, I had no fixed notions of painting; now, I dived in with the frisson of one let loose in a wonderland. Everything about Mary was magical to me, and the canvases arrayed around the studio, largely male nudes, recumbent or not, plugged into Mary's fascination with classical mythology, and made a case for Mary as a Don Juana, a seducer of men.

Heady stuff, and often Mary's tales were about men who had posed for her. Vertiginous, but I was on the verge, nonetheless, of a full-on love affair, maybe marriage, to a women powerful enough to be called a Creatrix, a female goddess in the world, and I knew it. Sleeping with Mary meant something it never could with others; rather than a mere palliative, if you could get her to put out in the studio, you were plugging into a mythological web, glistening and intricate, stitching yourself, possibly, into history, and the come was in colors—

Riot Grrrl

Prize partridge around Media, Mary was also a bad seed or rebel par excellence. She doped and fucked her way in divergent directions; got dropped into hospitals; rode with her assumed husband on a motorbike; in the parlance of the times, granting complete credulity to her tales, a wilder riot grrrl never drew breath.
What mattered to me was whether I had her or not.
This remained variable, as Abby also appeared, and both of us caught viable action on the side. One summer night, after a brief, mutually adulterous separation, she arrived by cab to Logan Square, in frilly dress, hair in a bun.
I grabbed her and fucked her on the floor, and that (somehow) was it— marriage consummated. Even if Mary moaned about my drug shortages. Love always seemed richer, to her, on Klonopins.

The only one who ever drove me into delirium fits with jealousy, Mary was. She was adept at being a little lost sheep, for anyone (curator or not) to salvage and rescue, if I had displeased her even for a night.
The only one who ever made me weep from pure obsessive anguish, so that so much of my life became dramatic, I might as well have been back with the Outlaw Playwrights. I knew now how to evaluate compositions, the quirks of colorations, what the Renaissance taught us about body-soul unity; more importantly, for me, I knew what body-soul unity meant when an individual falls in love. I cannot say, the only one I was ever in love with; but my deepest sense ever was, of love running in red blood through my veins, out of my pores, into her.

Starlight

Maybe its because October nights on the East Coast can still be sultry; it was still reasonably early, 10:30; us three in our usual semi-stupefied lethargy got a rush of energy, decided to take a walk over to Fresh Grocer at 40th & Walnut, get some grub, often in short supply at 4325. I got French bread, Mary got vegetables for stir fry, for Abby too, and as we walked home what awaited us was little we didn't want. We were too stoned to be selfconsciously anything, but you can bet we were stared at, with our symmetrical features, sculpted cheekbones, and yet West Philly had glitter all over it because everybody hit the street simultaneously, we walked, levitated with everyone, and everyone levitated with us—the house party a few nights later was beyond levitational. Every young painter in Philly crowded into the lived-in, yellow lit kitchen to do whiskey shots, and drove a bunch of points home about how the city was now working together, firing off on all cylinders at once, even as Mary abstained, as usual, from alcohol, which took her nervous system and trashed it. The painters were obliging about the poet's participation, as laughter ricocheted into the grassy backyard area, with its rusty fence, small concrete plots, placing us in a city space with real green in it, even as trees began to yellow, and as the warm weather held.

When the door to Mary's room shut an hour later, we took the starlight in with us, painted and owned it.

Live Forever

We had it then— not just the embedded depth of soul love, but glamour right on the ground, as the formation formed by which Mary and I spent all of our nights together. Our route— West Philly to Logan Square and back— took two disparate locales, made them whole, out of a sense that they were meant to be wed, just as we were; Logan Square with its sleek, modish urbanity, West Philly with its rusticity, climbing ivy, plus the obvious inversion of a well-worn media cliché against it. By New Years Eve, 2003, there was so much gaiety in the air, we'd pierced a hole in the obdurate, obtrusive surface of human life, to find ourselves in a tropical paradise—

I relate to it, now, as a clear demonstration that Heaven on Earth happens. In Abby, we had a soul sister; in the large co-op twin on Baltimore Ave., a safe haven; my flat in Logan Square created a different, representatively recent kind of stage; all were playgrounds where the dope, pills, every thing else was shared by all, as all of our bodies were for each other and no one else. The profound ecstasy of that New Years was that a bunch of artistic misfits found ways and means of being completely at home in the world, against constraints that needn't have been there, with a serene sense of what it might mean to live forever. We were right, then and there, to be who we were, and we knew it—

Genius Loci

West Philly swung, night by night, around all of us.
I couldn't not notice— Diana was delicately gorgeous.
She spent lots of time in the room next door.
One night, deep into the wee hours, and as the entire house tripped (taken off, it seemed, into distant universes, sucked into black holes, or even flipped the switch into primordial ooze and chaos), I swung dumbly into Kevin's open door, found Diana tripping on the bed, in tee and panties. As I sat down on the bed, all that occurred to me was to follow my instincts. The genius loci of that place and time was all about nothing else, and the sense that Diana, whose elegant lashes and sculpted cheekbones belied her wildness, existed as an archetype I came to worship at the shrine of, even as music roared from down the wood-floored hall, Mary and Abby slept on the other side. I ascertained, later, Diana, who I hadn't known before, had changed her name, to stake a claim, against missing other ladies' fun. She would become an arriviste for me, later, also, once the two stalwarts were out of the way.

Hopefully, foggy memories would make me hesitant to claim knowledge, more than stunted, of her bellicose, venom-bordered insides, of a stunted child, Lolita as painted by Goya. Lolita painted by Goya, however, is still Lolita. Nothing child-like in that wildness.

Quicksand

I can't imagine Jenny having small, still voices anyway—voices of conscience, for example— Jenny was too hung up on devilry to house or maintain them. Jenny liked being a punk and a devil. If you gave her a brain-scan, for the fifteen-minute interval I was in her here— her being Diana, being Mary's housemate, mine part of the time, too— how I imagine her brain moving is its own scan of the tactile around her. I was mostly likely wearing a blue or green Fruit-of-the-Loom tee-shirt.
Good hygiene. Able to take the signal sent— her lounging half-naked on the bed, alone, in the early morning, with no one around.
The door, of course, being wide open, so maybe Mary could walk by and see what was going on. Us, both, she would know, being stoned. But, to cut right down the middle, what Jenny had in her brain, other than the Bible and Renaissance, and that flashed against Mary's preoccupations no matter what— the Bible seems to have been, for Jenny, a vision of her native Maryland as a collection of retarded infants. The Nativity would then become a collection of bloopers, bleeps, and practical jokes performed by said retarded infants. I pumped away at her as my own kind of retarded infant.

The Renaissance ringleaders, for her, were stalwarts against the Italians—the Spanish Masters. The crazy, spooky, dusky earth-tone troupe.
Body-soul harmony replaced by bile, crud, filth, but also a strange kind of truth-telling about the human race, that the Renaissance never dares. The ultimate, enfranchised reality of the grotesque.
So, Jenny gets laid by her house-mate's husband, who, she knows, feels entitled to do the task, owing to said house-mate's transgressions.
Jenny is not herself, exactly, as this happens. The open door has them walk Goya's tight-rope. Jenny tells the truth more than Mary does. Quicksand.

4325 Baltimore Avenue

Jason cooking flounder on a filthy range, fish picked up at 40th and Walnut where Penn students mingled with artists, subversives, bums, and mothers. Where, also, we'd carry out French bread (two bucks) for moonlit walks home down rustic, mansion'd streets. Fish-wafts filled the lovably threadbare kitchen laden with mustard and crumbs. Mary's Acme-purchased pesto pasta, Olive-oil Goddess, she'd make a pot on pot in a pot and we'd have a bowl from the pot watching rented French-flicks in the lived-in living room. Paintings, Mary's evocations Dionysus and Apollo, Jason post-Dali post-structuralist Dada and Derrida derived violences, submitted to smitten PAFA judges, originals all flecked with little chips from the falling ceiling leaned on the walls. Parties on the green-awning'd porch, weed midnights—butt-smoke, frost-breath, gun-stocked West Philly cops stop to shock us with looks as we loiter, amused. Moments later I'd drag Mary into her wood-floored bedroom and frivolously fuck her, hoping Josh and Kevin might spy us. One time on whiskey Mary's diaphragm got stuck inside her and I felt it, fucking her, we laughed, Mary's hair then was long down to her ass, raucous, gone. Diana remained unrevealed as she revealed herself in the next room, ready to lead me, always, to my doom.

Golden apogee— everyone hot— everyone fucking, painting, making music, boozing, drugging, sucking, humping, leaning on nothing but the night's promise, our nexus the nexus, our moment the moment, all now reduced to ash, nothing but a shut window, a fiery memory of an open one—

Fridge

For all that 4325 Baltimore Avenue was a hothouse ambience, generating all the action a young artist could want, the fridge was a hovel. The lordly sense of warm entitlement, to graduate from a serious matrimonial bed down the due-right set of stairs from Mary's room, all for a midnight snack, was thus undercut. What you would see when opening the refrigerator door— two-thirds a salami, tin-foiled only halfway, or an uncovered bowl of half-eaten pasta salad, along with Mary's more staunch, more solid Brita pitcher, then desert terrain, of the grungy, grimy kind—bespoke of the vicissitudes of Bohemia, taken out to the Nth. I learned to bring my own snacks, and Mary's Brita-water was fine as accompaniment. The due-left set of stairs from Mary's room, where, when she had finally konked out, a combination of pot and matrimonial exercises rendered her useless until the morning, led down into the foyer area at the front of the house, where new arrivals could be heard banging around at all hours. I seldom ventured down those stairs in the middle of the night. It seemed to me that the politics of the house favored me in Mary's room with her, even when she was rendered senseless.

The kitchen was nonetheless loose enough, that if I showed up after midnight, no one minded seeing me in my boxers.
All of this was precocious of all of us— we celebrated, from that fridge on out, a new America, a cultural America that soared past what had been imagined before. The bawdy, boisterous level of the celebration made victory seem like a fait accompli. But, to make a crude pun, our salami was only half tin-foiled then. Time would tell.

Lull

Attendant on the mystery— that a house could exist for us, where we all felt at home, us misfits— is the inevitable dark side of the equation. I could never get any writing done at 4325.
Mary, Abby, Diana, were all too distracting, not to mention Zooska, the loquacious house-cat, who would often settle on Mary's bed when we had parties in her room. In fact, the entire period of the early Aughts is marked, for me, by a sense of indeterminate writerly infertility. The big creative surge I'd experienced, towards the end of my time in State College, I'd knocked down what walls were in my way, put up my own new architecture. The cocktail of what in my head stood behind that writing— the Symbolists, the Beats, also several years of philosophy coursework at PSU, including the Continental jaunts they were famous for— didn't need the later elixir of English Romanticism to establish its own fertility. Within its own modest parameters, it allowed me in text to be the Rimbaud I wanted to be. That— a variant of Rimbaud's punkish adolescent— is the persona which manifested in State College. I had the wherewithal then to follow it through. Seasons in drug-hell fed the flames the right way.

By 4325, this had graduated into an awkward transitional period.
The discovery of Romanticism as a wellspring I found less instantly useful than the Symbolists. It was no longer appropriate to wear the mask of a bratty, if visionary, adolescent anymore, either. I was stuck. What bled out of me, during the early years with Mary, was miscellaneous. Mary's literary conservatism meant that what she looked for in poetry was lyricism. So, I wrote lyrical strophes to her. The electric charge into vital action came later— received from plugging into the international English-language avant-garde. This was a lull.

Oafishness

Cresting onto the wave of the present, the specter subsists of who we are, who we have been. We travel endless eternities to get back to the square one— this is who we were, and more importantly, this is how we were seen. Mary, who painted me as Michelangelo's David, saw me as him— naked, raw flesh, handy in bed, but rough around the edges, impulsive, and eager, in an oafish way, to sleep with as many women as I could. All these eternities later, looking at Philadelphia in the Aughts, I am unable to say that the raw, naked meat part of me was not motivated by the crass impulse to prove my viability in the world by racking up conquests, as though all the bed-hopping were a sport, and I a detested vulgarian by taking a game she played too out to the Nth of complete excess. If, nonetheless, the whole thing is to laugh, it is because I never, then or now, found Jesus, his eagerness to mortify his senses and thus enhance his spirituality, that interesting. The clumsy oaf who would stumble into the next room and fornicate with Jenny, herself an oaf of crafting wickedly and mischievously undetectable appearances, likes to think that these games are all towards the good, and that the expansiveness of raw meat, taken out to the Nth, is simultaneously an expansion of consciousness. If Jenny and I left the door open, out of naïve trust or just oafish dumbness as usual, there remains that space in human reality that stands on the precipice and just jumps— like The Fool in the Major Arcana of the tarot deck, who has Holiness against Jesus in headlong momentum towards the crazy wisdom of real, tactile experience, we wanted to see what could happen next.

What happened, from 2026, is that the world is onto our games and our conflicts. They care. Oafishness is an interesting religion, too.

The Young and the Restless

Dredging up dirt from the depths of our own Earth, let it not be said about the Divine Miss H that nothing in her mirrored my own carnivorous oafishness. Indeed, I rush to defend myself against accusations of oafishness with the data that the first half of the year 2002 was made completely miserable for me by the Divine Miss H doing a yo-yo routine with my body, my soul, and everything integrated between my inner-Jesus and David cohering then. Three times, during the first half of 2002, I was, I felt, consolidated into the kind of ad hoc marriage which was to be our signature. Three times, during said period, the Divine Miss H abruptly announced, apropos of dropping a bomb as casually as possible, that she was now sleeping with Whoever, which meant I was back on the hook of being on hold, indefinitely. During these excruciating times, I found myself not Jesus or David but Adam, and madly in love with a complete twit, whose tartishness outshone the very sun in the sky, and who I might paint, if I could paint, as Isis, or Ingres' Odalisque, or even, to be ribald, and take the thing more where I wanted to go, Manet's Olympia. So, the boor banging away at the Divine Miss K has ways and means of defending himself, against a classic Lady-of-the-Scales, the Cardinal Air, who is always happy to rationalize away unpleasant realities as she does her sweep-throughs. As we take whatever place the world gives us in the vaunted Culture Firmament which overhangs our enterprise, no one did The Young and the Restless quite like us. A soap opera we were, with stakes very high to annihilate the entire cultural past of America. Tarts and oafs.

Indication

Chord after chord, in succession, completing formulas with word after word— we, the two of us, looked out into the audience— the vibratory frequency was right to say we achieved lift-off, levitation. Outside Tritone, cabs, cars, buses ranged this stretch of South Street, west of Broad, an uncommon one, past the reach of the teenagers and tourists. And Matt, not one to gush, simply gestured to indicate he'd enjoyed the proceedings.
An audience, I learned, either gets taken somewhere or they don't. A keyboard rig with pedals, effects boxes—a writer with work semi-proven, still young— Apollo, Dionysus doing their usual uneasy dance. The miniature one-hitter shaped like a little golden baseball bat— Matt and I all brimstone to get high. Giant steps, small leaps. Indication.

Sauce

It wasn't just wild stuff— the Aughts delivered lessons, tangibly manifested, to guide all riders on this particular storm how to live. Like, as Matt was to help me learn, you can't get Mary and Abby anywhere near alcohol without their two asses bouncing off the walls. At first, it seemed okay. Matt sat at his console, doing mixing work, as the two ladies conspired a voyage with Bacchus.
Someone had blundered— Abby was aggravated— had to get home on her bike— Mary ducked under her crab-shell covering— a ghastly crescendo was at hand. As was lucky, South Philly is only a few blocks, where we were, from not-South Philly, where the wholesome game begins again, so that Abby's shrieks never reached deafening proportions. But, the Muse insisted, keep them away from the sauce.

Sanctuary

I could bring her coffee-table Raphael books, sketch-pads, colored pencils, chocolate, but what I could not offer her is something secret she was looking for. What that secret was, how to completely bedazzle, mystify, seduce, exalt, depress, and finesse all of human reality without losing an essential sense of balance in day to day life, was the big currency she was missing. Penn Medical Center had a pretty bare-bones mental health wing— uncarpeted linoleum floors, harsh lighting, low ceilings, few windows, so that Mary could not be properly backlit when I visited her there. Yet she got at least some of what she was looking for, because she had her own secret, carried with her since adolescence. Beneath all the bravado, even Mary's hurricane years were tinted oddly by a subterranean sense that she longed to receive sanctuary somewhere, anywhere. Mary, hurricane or not, intensely wanted to be laid to rest in a quiet place, where she could rest without any daily concerns, and be as taken care of as she could be. So here she was at PMC, and she was insured— she could do this. Yet it meant, for me, that all that tumult, with all that day to day neediness, would have to create an overspill effect which would stop me from moving forward in the world. Thus, this was the beginning of the process of breaking up with her the first time. I tried to give her sanctuary, too, and failed; the momentum of both of our lives made it impossible to do so. So, as she sat, paging lovingly through Raphael, and the other inmates chowed down on Sleepless in Seattle, I was left to understand just how much starlight human life can encompass or accommodate, and also how fragile those beams may become, under the rigors of the mundane.

Bloodhounds

It wouldn't have occurred to my brain, still novice in some respects, that a week in Quebec could deliver Mary and I the status of ex-pats. The bloodhounds on the train sniffed at us, I felt, with a hale and hearty sense of jouissance, as if to say, here's two live ones. We were at least circumspect enough to know, and we did know, as we fished for our passports, not to try and bring dope. We'd have to get our kicks some other way in Montreal. This was resented by the bloodhounds, who saw and knew just how suspect we were, from our quirky hipster attire to our overly-clever conversations. The bloodhounds, in fact, grunted when they realized we'd outwitted them. Mary's big kick, as was not unusual, was her camera, and herself. I was raw meat— not only did I not realize we were instant ex-pats, I did not really fathom the potency of pictures, portraits taken in a foreign country. As the bloodhounds sashayed down the train line, errant thoughts led them to the conclusion that the blonde, despite her reasonable passport and lack of dope, knew only too well how to milk this new place for maximum future-icon wattage.

So, once we settled in on Saint Catherine Street, the camera became our constant companion, and Mary couldn't have been more hype, as a visual artist and person, to be backlit Montreal-style. All these eternities later, the raw meat level of who I was then remains— by far the most memorable shot happened in our little sub-bed & breakfast, second-floor garret, in the middle of a morning argument about whatever. Mary unfolded her extremely rigorous plans for us for the day, and I objected. I wanted to spend at least one day sitting in cafes, trying to meet some local artists. To have a good time, in other words. I snapped the money-shot as she leaned into the window case. Done.

Versailles

Kids we were, moving about in worlds not realized, yet the big, enfranchised Montreal portrait of Mary demonstrates just how self-conscious she was about images and imagery.
When I snapped the portrait, in the middle of what became our Montreal routine, she was as completely in control, completely in command as she could possibly be. I would never have guessed— I now imagine the night we arrived in the room on Saint Catherine Street, Mary's first look around was where to stand when pictures, portraits could be taken.
This, on a more than semi-conscious level, was her way of making up to me that the big push towards enfranchisement would have to be mine. There, in the architectural niche to the left or the right of the large rectangular (oblong) window-case—there, vacillating between escape from the pursuit of the male gaze and defiant (as in her adolescence) confrontation— were she to make her stand there, adding the contemporary touch of the jade pendant (looping in the fashionistas), the chiaroscuro of who she could or could not be in the world would be an unambiguous study in pristine ambiguities. That calculatedness, on this particular level, was invisible to me then, as was Mary's tacit acknowledgement to herself that the long, slow haul would have to be me alone. She evened the score for herself by doing extra work, which subliminally made it that our time in Montreal was a working vacation for her.

All that calculatedness also meant that her voice could never stop ringing in my ears. We would be working together for the rest of my life, no matter what. The room on Saint Catherine Street not any more cheerful than anything else, but cheerful for her when she knew, as I did not, how the portrait would look. Versailles, at least.

Undercurrents

In the usual miscellaneous array of things-that-have-been, the early Aughts emerge as another time, another configuration.
The idea of the Internet café, passe by the Twenties, was big then. What Saint Catherine Street had was an Internet café of sorts, directly across the street from Mary and I's temporary abode, and also on the second floor. So that, if Mary was tired out from the day's exertions, and we were, perhaps, waiting to change clothes and go out to dinner, she would pick up her sketch book and I would head across the street. The café level was weak; they didn't have much but candy, candy bars, & soda; but that wasn't important to me. The big e-mail I remember receiving in Montreal was from Ted, who I had grown up with in Cheltenham. Ted, who had a bi-coastal orientation at the time, but was always interested to hear what had befallen his errant, unceasingly amusing comrade. Ted heard the entire tale of our vacation as it had unfolded, and offered a sense of congratulations for our having arrived, albeit briefly, as ex-pats. As I would read Ted's missives, I flashed back to being thirteen with Ted at the Jersey shore. It was all there— the Otherness, the adventure level of being in a strange place, and I was already precociously dreaming of blonde goddesses, even as Ted preferred brunettes.

The picture snapped of us, together on a floatation device, returning from a bout with Atlantic undercurrents— salt on our tongues, we'd been dunked— was about brotherhood. We took on the ocean together.
Now, we were handling another ocean— marriage. Salt on our tongues, indeed. Ted thought of me in Montreal with the blonde, remained laconic about his brunette. I didn't push. But the two grown men lived with undercurrents we could never have guessed were there, before.

Parc Lafontaine

Being stripped of the rituals and routines which sustained us, in Montreal Mary and I had no recourse but to face exactly who we were, individually and reciprocally On one sunny day, we sat in Parc Lafontaine, and for a good twenty minutes had nothing to say to each other. We were taxed by being alone together constantly, not by any sense of fighting. But, as we learned, there can be an infinite amount of space even between two people whose lives are entwined, and so it was with us. That, until we realized, with some dismay, that the Parc Lafontaine bathroom situation was haphazard. Parc Lafontaine, which looked not unlike an extended, forested version of Logan Circle in Philly, was a place meant to be finessed by serious Montreal people who knew the ins and outs of the place. We were foreigners. Mary grew agitated. She needed to use the bathroom, having had, if I remember correctly, too much tea with our breakfast. The wall-like silence was broken by the panic scenario, a not uncommon one, of the foreigners looking to take care of their physical mechanisms the right way. We rambled, scrambled, and lunged into a random lunch/dinner place which had not yet opened. They were gracious enough to let Mary use their facility. Oddly enough, the incident brought us together again, left us in a better mode. But the whole expanse of time in Montreal, wherein we were locked into each other, I experienced as a Dantean Purgatorio. It needed to be documented, by ourselves, for ourselves, that we could hack the rigors of foreign travel, and the disjuncture it entails. Everything raw and jagged about our relationship would have to come to the surface— wall-like silences, awkward spaces.

Parc Lafontaine became a tragi-comic reminder of travails begetting triumphs, adversity become strength. Logan Circle with forests.

Repertoire

In the repertoire or array of arts and tricks developed by Mary in her childhood and adolescence, only an onlooker with eagle eyes could distinguish what emerged as, possibly, the most important one. Mary got off, as they say, on swings back and forth on paradoxes and dichotomies.
My mind teetered through this terrain about her insides as I chanted out, through gritted teeth, the abstruse formulas of the Bringing Down the Light ritual I had thoughtfully included in our luggage. Mary rocked back and forth on our adequate, if not luxuriant, bed, here in this garret room on Saint Catherine Street. She was distraught; naked but for her panties; we'd just seen sights in the neighborhood she found harrowing, a barroom brawl, the spilling of a pool of actual blood; we were alone in a foreign country. It jumped up in my blood uncomfortably that Mary was a sucker for the wasted elegance of a nice, cozy hospitalization.

In a foreign country no less, far from the usual support systems. So, I chanted, accompanied it with the requisite hand and arm movements, as dictated by the file I'd downloaded once I'd received the key from the Thelemic Order of the Golden Dawn. How Mary learned, in an avatar-like way, to tune in on raw energy frequences, rather than fixating on rituals that had to focus on Jesus and the Bible, I don't know. It was the sense, as a girl, that the world inside her, starting with colors and forms, was just too huge to be encompassed by any one belief or value system.
It was an intense desire for the polyglot fluency of a mind that could find dichotomies to ride— flesh/spirit, abstinence/consummation—anywhere. As Bringing Down the Light concluded, I noted that Mary was healed. The raw energy frequency of the script saw us through—I'd pulled up heads that Mary's repertoire (heathen/believer) held fast.

Flame-Heads

I would learn later in my life, with a sense of tickled amusement, the term recon folks dish out for blonde women: flame-heads. The lazy, crazy, hazy flame-heads of the world want everything to be unique, singular, special. Corresponding with Ted, I flashed back on another scene from our adolescence, as I went the rigorous daily rounds with Mary. It was a night in Glenside— we were doing an extended phone-chat, as we sometimes did, with a few girls our age, who happened to be stationed at Oak Summit Apartments, a few blocks away. One was a blonde, and a queen among blondes, for thirteen-year-olds—already physically developed, precociously sharp about being a woman. The other, brunette, was less goddess-ish, but also imperious about demanding reality from people who talked to her— a real no-bullshit controller of who was telling the truth about what, who was being real. The deal was simple for Ted and I, although the time was a little late, maybe 10:30 pm. We would crash the Oak Summit apartment— I would take the blonde, he the brunette. We got, as was not unusual, parent-blocked.

But it was funny to me then, as Mary and I, say, climbed Mount Royal, or strolled Saint Denis Street, so that Mary could see a special exhibit there, or toured Christ Church Cathedral, where Mary disappeared for ten extremely frightening minutes and was then found again, or sat around on the McGill campus, that I was specially with the special blonde, just as I wanted, but that it was not as completely a solution to my health and welfare as I thought it would be. Ted's penchant for hard-headed practicality was interesting, too. I would later say: love of flame-heads is love of fire.

Jagged

Being cut off from the drugs she used to stabilize and balance her emotions, Mary was a prey to moodiness in Montreal. So much of what we were doing was about seeds planted for our future as artists— all long-range plans Mary had made— that Mary blew off caring about the short-term goal of having any fun or kicking back and seriously relaxing. Credit where credit's due— Mary learned, very thoroughly, her way around Montreal before we got there. Navigating the Montreal subway system was thus easy with her around. Nor was there any dawdling about where to go next— Mary was a cyclone of involvement on that level, and it was all taken from my hands. It's just that, in my youth, I did not understand, and Mary did not bother to explain, the calculatedness of what her camera did, where we went, what we saw in what order and why. And pot not being there to take the edge off, for both of us, meant that we could hit a jagged interval at any time. What Mary had available as a combo— pills, Klonnies, and no pot— made a cocktail that could run around loose for a whole day, but then crash abjectly into a trance-level stupor not to be untangled. Mary, without pot, was also easily spooked, not just by barroom brawls on Saint Catherine Street but by anything that seemed like someone was sending her bad vibes. The night Mary abruptly gestured for us to leave a random English-language bookstore on the Plateau, I thought she was merely bored, but when I looked closer at her, I understood that she felt someone had made an inappropriate, ominous pass while I had my back turned. Mary without pot could be paranoid. The moments we spent close to the edge just had to be endured, as the seeds that needed to be planted were.

Devil's World

The realer real realities can be pretty frumpy, right?
What God, or tapping into God-force energies, is—a long, slow haul, in which you have to do everything for yourself. You want quick action, you go to the Devil.
Quick action will be delivered, but the repercussions will be negative, and everything you've accomplished will be erased. Rocks and hard places. Except to say, that when the days in Montreal ended with us ensconced, it seems to me that Mary had on her mind, other than pictures, portraits taken and places visited, the fretful sense, even then, that she should be with someone else. Someone with more money, more worldly power. She would choose to note, as she lay there, half-asleep, that the fresh-faced David stud guy, with David capacities, who was (she would have to admit) intelligent, was still a poor substitute for the right kind of banker or trust-funder, who could buy her clear passage to the right kind of renown. The depth of my devotion to her was not in question. The question was about what it means to live in the Devil's world, in which all that long, slow haul, God-force energy, is easy to doubt, because we would all like something more demonstrative, more rapidamente.

The noises from Saint Catherine Street, from where we were on the second floor, weren't that obtrusive, but there were some.
No air conditioning meant I used a wet sponge to help me cool off. Mary did similarly. If I had more money, of course, she wouldn't have had to, because we would be staying somewhere more grandiose. In the Devil's World, the long, slow, God-force informed haul, which was to be our destiny, is full of doubts.
Mary wanted quick action, not just sex, part of the time too. Good night.

Proven

You might not want to call us scoundrels, for the time we spent basking in the glow of the foreign. Cheating Montreal meant being there in the midst of their brief, two-month summer. Our second-floor garret room, not up to bed & breakfast level but also private, secluded from any kind of staff or maintenance person, under the aegis of God knows what or who, directly overlooked Saint Catherine Street.
No air conditioning; the mornings were sticky. Mary had a number of brisk mornings in a row, long agendas of where to go, what to do all day already planned. But on one sultry morning, she tried to access the fuse-box of purposeful, assertive day-momentum, and failed. What happened instead was nothing unusual— the re-consummation of our marriage, into the exotic earth around and beneath us—but it changed our dynamic permanently. It always meant that our thoughts of who we had been and what we had done together could go skyward at any moment, even once we were no longer together. There was nothing about who we had been that could be erased. The consummation ceremony—slow, languorous, in bright morning sunshine striking the queen-size bed occupying the center of a space uncarpeted, wood-slat floors, walk-in shower, no bath (and certainly no Continental breakfast waiting for us)— did its milestone number.

If it was done Bohemian-style, it was a raw, as usual, version of Bohemia we channeled. At the end of the day, nothing to romanticize, just the sense that Mary's camera caught her at an absolute zenith of body/soul unity, just as she wished.
Our time in bed was a deep breath we took together. And proven.

Absorbing the Mountain

And did she know, Miss H, how dirty it would have to be, for us to make it in the world? She must've.
Beneath the veil of enfranchised blondeness, a quite precocious mind. Certainly, she noticed my own moment of most achieved satisfaction, other than our usual antics—the climbing of Mount Royal. It was though the nature forces, who perceived us on our particular hike, rewarded me, once Miss H's mystical spell had been cast, for years in which grit and grime would have to stick to every attempt at success in the literary world, artistic world, avant-garde, or what have you. I stood on top of Mount Royal with an epiphany going that was handed to me from somewhere else. I would be the one to dive into the mud, appease the squealers and oinkers, amuse the dogs. That's why Mary submitted to me. For a blistering moment, atop Mount Royal, it all made sense— what it would mean to be a man who could provide for my loved ones. Even if being artists angled us against conventional assignations. Another hot, sunny day, Mary quiet, after a series of cell phone calls back to Philadelphia. Me in thrift-store trousers I'd picked up on South Street, slightly beleaguered here by other tourists' more conventional attire. Not caring much, a man living through a moment of having proven again what Mary and I had proved together— the world could be solid, life could be solid, and solidity could be imposed on what might remain gelatinous if not imposed on. Fudging things, playing dirty, was permissible if the foundational ethos behind it was solid. This, I learned later. Now, minutes in the sun, absorbing the mountain.

Loner

Chopping into the innards of a spectacular spring day, I cannot help but wonder at how long its taken me to get to simple home truths about Mary and I. To see, really and truly, where the walls were and why they were there. It would never have occurred to me in Montreal, for instance, to understand that, if Mary did not share my penchant for hanging out in cafés, meeting the local Bohemians, it's because her primordial stance before the world was not a social one. Behind all the seductive razmatazz, she was a loner. I'm included, then, in her package deal, because she's spotted that I have talent. Once that's established, I become an extension of the idea that Mary will surround herself with tokens and totems to reinforce her eventually triumphant emergence in the world.

The drug girls, like Saskia and Maya, came and went. Abby was allowed to stay because, like me, she became another talented extension of Mary herself. All the levels of personal interaction between Mary and I wavered between real intimacy and the impersonality of me being David, the ideal male nude, who could also sub as a permanent curator for her too, and, most importantly, a backer for her with more vital energy than she had. By Montreal, Mary was slightly lost from all the powder that had gone up her nose. It imperceptibly started to be the case that she dropped plans to take the East Coast by storm, continued with me in the hopes, well-founded, that I would never drop her.
She was right: I would not. When we had a photo-strip done at a photo booth in a random Montreal train station, she was the one who knew I would make it public. That jade pendant again. Us.

Our Dance

Taking it again to a place which might seem gratuitous, Mary and I were two elaborate brains in two elaborate bodies. I can only conjecture, about the texture of Mary's consciousness, regarding what sexual power I might or might not have had over her. The anti-panegyric, as it were, to David, Biblical Adam, and the man himself, which centered on my oafishness, needs to be balanced by Mary's own implied confession of fragility on several relevant levels.
Mary took wifely time, at least some of the time, to do crafts work around our marriage. Such as, putting together a hand-crafted picture book about our adventure in Montreal. As I saw her doing it, I understood that not every level of Mary's brain was glued to an unconventional frequency. What stunned me is that when the book was completed, it was a fait accompli to hand the book to me for safe keeping. Beneath her painterly machismo, the photos in the book which could be used to our advantage had to be bequeathed to me, because Mary knew, in a world-weary way, that her shakiness rendered her ineligible to keep the thing. Everything about us to he consolidated would have to be consolidated by me. Does consolidation, aesthetic or otherwise, have to be a man's work?

So, over decades, for the oaf with Michelangelo's stud as a doppelganger, there is also the wry sense that Mary was willing to admit, out of the side of her cannabis-caressed mouth, that I was capable of a level of responsibility and responsiveness to necessity that she was not. All her major photographs, in fact, were bequeathed to me. She was intelligent enough, canny enough, to know that if she put me at the center of them, I'd follow them through. Our dance.

The Ritz

Like anyone else bent towards the substantial, Mary had to live in the world as it was. She had to make her picks, out of the daily culture that was just around, what to patronize— what to watch, what to listen to.
Politics were perfunctory for her. For us, too, because I always felt politics dwells too much on present-mindedness.
The movies Miss H chose to watch, and for us to watch together, were mostly European art-house. That's why nights at The Ritz, Philly's choice art-house theater in those days, were always special. As I could never not be amused with, European art-house for Miss H often devolved into what I called Euro-Smarm. These were the kind of European dramatic presentations with a patina of artiness about them, but beneath, if you looked closely at plot, characterization, it was just The Young and the Restless again. Specifically, The Ritz at the Bourse, where I took Mary to see Amelie on what amounted to our first date, and chundered through two hours of totalized tweeness that took me on a heart-of-darkness journey about what my future held, was attractive to Mary on other levels. The theaters were underground, so to speak, so that you would need to take a long escalator down to reach them. Other amenities, red plush carpeting, a concession stand tastefully placed in the center of a composition with theater doors to the right of it, the sense that one could see, even from the bottom of the escalators, up onto Fourth Street, through a series of large, artful glass panes, made Mary feel comfortable patronizing The Ritz. She did so as an individual, as was important, not declasse. Against the world, Mary at her best knew how to make herself comfortable.

Theater of the Living Arts

Sour-puss it is, how culture goes up and down, taking with it, sometimes, real things that people really like, replacing them with the half-real or worse. How Ted and I, for instance, paraded through the sections of West Coast Video in Glenside— the epoch of video stores— looking for the movie to rent for the night—pricelessly about two kids, being as culturally for real as we could be. Ted did not share my taste for the macabre, so no I Spit On Your Grave or Basket Case. Video stores, the good ones, were wholesomely about being for real.
The mid-Twenties finds it all a memory, except to say that the gliding sashay through sections of Miss H at the TLA (Theater of the Living Arts) video store on Spruce Street, not far from Broad, in Center City Philly, easily outdid Grace Kelly being Grace Kelly— the Main Line being adjacent, as it still is, to Media. If I tried a classy macabre move, like Suspiria, Mary would still turn up her nose. Would it have to be more Euro-Smarm? Probably. But catch Mary browsing with me at TLA, and you have a couple united in perfect happiness, absolute harmony. The night was about to be disposed of the right way. A few tokes on the right spliff, and in my pad the blue IKEA couch turned around to face a mid-sized, adequate computer monitor, and we were ready to roll. The whole video store ritual lost, to an entire culture, is a cruel one. Nothing's a complete experience anymore. Nights can be jagged. By the time Mary had a solid laptop, we moved up together, to Netflix. Mary got macabre, with Six Feet Under. She had too much class to spit on graves.

Star Child

So, there we sat in Kim's car, for the hour's ride back from New Hope to Center City; drowsy, all three of us, on a bunch of laced weed, thinking whatever we were thinking. Kim kept putting the pedal to the metal at times slightly off. We all could've been as good as dead, if we didn't have it, but we did. What we had was a shared pact, into the air, the spheres, the universe, that whatever befell us at that time, that place, we would have to survive, because we just would. And we did. Which didn't change the state of affairs, stagnant for both of us with Kim, not brimful of anything, that whatever soporific fantasies I might've had, our taking her out to canoe on the Delaware did not result in any consummation, and with her forgetting her purse on one of the islands, where we got even more trashed.

We forgot about this, the ride home, Kim's reflexes, how the rest of our lives depended on something not proven, trustworthy. The two buddies had brains circling similarly: nothing to worry about, go with it, understand your invincibility, it's there if you believe, it just is. Where shields like that come from, I don't know, but I will say— exclusivity is the rule. You only depend on it if you know it's there. Off the two of them went, into the late afternoon sun, after dropping me off in Logan Square. Somewhere, a frequency in the sky consolidated itself. Gaetan didn't look like a star-child then, but he was.
His magnanimity, more than a lion's, granted him nine lives.

Pot Hikes

To walk around Center City Philadelphia on a sunny spring or summer day, stoned on a lot of grass, was a tradition inaugurated by Gaetan and I at the turn of the century. The pot hikes, as you might call them, were a chance for us to create cultural discourses, air grievances, ruminate about our respective adolescences, compare notes on different levels about the Center City scene, and boast, also, of conquests, past, present, and future.
Macho stuff. But for two macho guys, thrown in headlong into a heady mix of infinite socio-sexual possibilities, even the continued, droll-ified war-chant bros before hos couldn't quell the cognitive dissonance which sometimes had to be there. Competition and competitiveness had to take and humanize a scenario that, when we walked around Rittenhouse Square, for example, was mixed up with celestial seasonings as well. The spring day I trundled Mary and Abby to Gaetan's studio in South Philly, the weather was idyllic. From inside the sparsely window'd second-floor studio-space, that didn't matter much. The agenda that mattered for me that day—I was with Mary, established, and I wanted to see if Gaetan and Abby would go for each other. Occasionally, like any other two bandito buddies, Gaetan and I would misfire. Gaetan, it turns out, when finally almost alone with the lanky, willowy blonde, lost his shit slightly.

Abby clammed up. Within an hour, all four of us were very stoned.
Gaetan and Mary danced around each other (Gaetan had music blaring from the studio speakers) provocatively. They were both drooling. I was used to seeing Gaetan do putz-out with girls, but this was my girl. I frog-marched the bewildered ladies out. No hard feelings.

Stoli

There was a rightness to it, a dozen of us sitting around in a circle, mostly naked, to celebrate Gaetan's birthday. The Stoli bottle circulated, taking us to a place transmuted into the right kind of drunkenness, even as a few yards away, through thick insulated walls, South Philly churned in its filthy bowels as usual. Festering, ready to toss the game for the rest of Philly, also as usual, it leered that any interested party could imbibe the right way here, get a new game on. As in, see if we could handle the rawness, realness, righteousness of being naked on what was shag carpeting. This, a room otherwise unfurnished, littered with instruments, amplifiers, speakers, not many amenities to mollycoddle the posh. The bodies of all and sundry had ways and means of being posh anyway, Anastasia clipped from a Victoria's Secret catalogue, heart-stopping as a Jersey born and bred vixen could be, calculating as Springsteen's Candy. By the time the bottle reached me, I had a lot to prove. I was compelled to say to this crowd, just by close conformity, I belong with you. Not that anyone noticed me in particular, or were reserved if they did.

In any case, I quaffed seven or eight shots of Stoli at once.
After a fifteen minute wave of utter ecstasy, which was able to unfold itself because I did it, I'd been approved, I knew I was in here the right way, I knew (also) I'd be sick if I stayed. So I quietly put on my clothes, staggered out into the autumnal mud of 13th Street, just north of Ellsworth, and my own circle closed.
The length of Center City, back to Logan Square, smudged gold.

Unhinged

Because you could cut paper with Anastasia's cheek-bones, and her wide hips supported no flab at all, & not to say her carriage announced any movements but a feline strut, a surfeit of attention is what she was used to. She paced the polished wooden Highwire floors, knocked back red wine, huffed nitrous, and put up the requisite inaccessible, impervious front to those foolhardy enough to believe they could approach her. I, for instance, knew the ropes, and had too much to do anyway. Except, at some point in one fateful night's festivities, all the junk in Anastasia's brain, everything frozen, lazy-loafing, shy of approach, froze— nights spent following other people around, waiting to be signaled, signals sent back registering ranking, surfeits of attention delivering not love but lust—caught up with her at last, and she exploded. Gaetan was exasperated to find her sitting in one of the windows of the gallery's west-facing façade, threatening to jump.

Gaetan was a cool customer, but spur him with something unhinged, he would warp into warrior mode, brusquely brush off those inexpert, and set to work. We all watched as Gaetan leveled with Anastasia, whose drunkenness was not helping her, leading her to understand that the situation was hardly hopeless. She had a real life, friends, purpose, and everyone here cared about her.
The party, as an entirety, you would think ceased, yet it did not. Not all the revelers realized the drama unfolding.
Even those who did drunkenly chose to trust Gaetan. I did, too, was right to. Philly fixed Jersey that night, as was its wont.

Luminescence

Mike and I hung back in the entranceway; difficult not to notice that The Bats had placed Abby, with electric keyboard and microphone, right at the center of the action.
The luminescence of the heir apparent to the French Neo-Classicists (no one since David could do portal-ways with her assurance) thusly declared its dominion over all.
Even as the homeliness of souped-up surf punk, thrown together by Abby & Liz, made an odd juxtaposition with compositional detailing worthy of Ingres himself, and from a center of consciousness just as immersed in girls.
Abby's way and manner of suturing together the sublime and the ridiculous in her life was unique, gutsy. The Highwire rocked on its foundations that night, as Mike and I watched, sharing a spliff. Liz had already decided: Abby was headed for me. This was a powerful scene. Abby enjoyed the discipline of placing herself under Liz, and getting official sanction to get laid with the one straight guy who meant the most to her was a special treat. Ultimately, the funniest, horniest joke is that this was the moment Abby came to be in full command of her painterly powers. The arcane sense of super-advanced spatiality in her brain liked the crowds and foot-lights just fine. They made her feel loved. For this brief moment, she could just about handle the demands of a history-making muse. It all coalesced into a sense that the ups and downs of days not untouched by the demands of regional celebrity (including media demands) pushed Abby into a space where she was compelled to be productive in other ways. One vision of the seeding of the century.

Palette

There, Laird was— suburban provider, Christian Rightest— but no goomba. The Harjus chose not to do outside-inside as a demarcative imperative. They were around. Abby, feasibly, could've been in with them.
It was a quirk of the time that she was not. Perhaps they would reject her dyke streak, dyke habits, dyke friends.
Hard to tell. But, worth knowing— there was no Abby to Media. Being lateral, the data is there to work with—Abby, of the two, could cut a rug properly. Mary, trying to dance, was a clumsy giraffe. Twice lateral, understand that Mary was very floridly emotional about other people.
She was personal. Abby was a spark-plug, but could also be a clod, where other people were concerned. When Abby danced with boys (and girls), she came to vivid life. Pre-ambling through the past, to get to the night, upstairs at the Khyber, dead of winter, when the Free School were stationed there for drinks, as were The Bats. I'm, in that context, the only Free School guy other than Gaetan who could man the dance floor, and of course Gaetan could wipe the floor with me there. As could Abby, and was doing precisely that, but then commenced to flirt with me. Aggressively. Letting through deeply felt emotions, for once, which had been boiling beneath the surface for years. Being passionate, like Mary. We spent maybe fifteen minutes grinding. Staying in that moment, no denying a shared sense of resentment with Mary, who had jumped ship, joined Laurie in pursuit of money. Let it be known, also, that her new material tastes were sophisticated ones, her new husband a sophisticated palette to feed. Now Abby and I could feed on each other.

Superimposition

A new racket for us, the Aughts, everything else—metaphysics out of the superimposition of faces.
Abby and I did it. To punish us, demonstrate for us the monstrosity of our perversion, Mary painted our two faces superimposed, against the sickliest, dullest earth-tone background color grid (puke green, even, putting in an appearance) imaginable. Our souls, she might say, had grown corrupt. We hurt her. All because, as she would later say, she trusted us, expected we would maintain reasonable boundaries. To Abby, sense was given to the idea that I was Mary's turf or real estate.
I had to hear that I was out of control. Also, a nascent, froth-mouthed corporate whore, moving towards corporate enfranchisement, playing hack games, doing hack tasks.

A clown-mask face it was. My misshapen, bloated head supported a clown's unruly mane, matched often to a red nose, white grease paint, here just Abby and I fused, a double-dose of self-parodic sliminess. Mary had been trapped, out in East Falls, into a compromised position.
The road forward materially was spiritually vacuous. She needed help from her family, but the conditions they laid down were unacceptable. As she gradually seduced them back into compliance, the concrete-grey ugliness of East Falls ate into her soul. It was Purgatory, capital P, for her.
The two slimeballs, supposed to be her soul-mates, decided to fuck hell out of each other to celebrate her absence. This, they'd been threatening to do from the beginning. Then, domes, circles, brain damage, eclipse. Superimposition.

Glass-Bottomed Boat

What was declasse in the world pissed Mary off to no end. What was frumpy, almost as much.
Drunken or stoned Mary, just-got-laid Mary, in a snit Mary, and even violently mood-swung Mary were all still trooper-level determined to maintain and consolidate style-levels. So, for Mary to manifest at the Highwire— and she only made one major appearance there— sunken into the depths of pony-tailed, sweat-shirted, no jade pendant-ed frumpiness, something would have to have been drastically off. Simple: it was Laurie, grinning impishly next to her, looking razor-sharp; a dream, in fact, of elegant semi-business (light business) attire. Laurie was also, then, often dressed tie-dyed, like a crunchy granola hippie— was, herself, a crunchy granola hippie— but also about business, and a pronounced, vested, holistic interest in her father's portfolio. That night, Laurie settled herself and sat around different places in the Highwire, like she was riding (as I had) a glass-bottomed boat in Nassau. She found ways of admiring the purple-striped fish (like Mary and I), the sky-blue fish, the ratty-tailed fishes, especially the lugubriously huge ones, but they were all beneath her, and securely so. In the war the two sisters were fighting, Laurie was momentarily winning, and saw expansive years coming, as a bridge to an easy victory. With me forgotten, Mary would occupy space in the world as Crazy Aunt Mary, semi-bag lady, living on other's charity, probably hers. And that would be fine. Mary disagreed.

Side-Armed

She said, undressing, to love is to be an orphan hiding from a hurricane in a church made of glass. Impractical, I said, and I don't like metaphors in bed anymore, in my old age, any more than I like spiders. Then, as we made love, she said, you're an orphan, hiding from a hurricane.
Oh, I said, are you a church made of glass?
Well, she said, I'm a little cracked, aren't I?
Outside, cars slithered by, oblivious, exhaust fumes tingeing humid summer air. You're cracked alright, and so is your sister, I see.
I baited her to collapse onto my chest, throwing stones side-armed, at this glass church

Ruth would have to be, to be here. She herself took time to investigate adultery, as other writers had— out of boredom, maybe, or out of her own side-armed need to express something more than the suburbs. That's where, unfortunately, they had her. She would not want her husband shown— I will not show him.
I will only say that what people who want to write work in on the side may be of interest or not, but manifests instincts we shared together, then and now. A month later: the City Hall court yard blazed with summer heat. We were over, that was it. She wanted, she said, some order and discipline in her life. Before us lies eternity, I said. Or eternal lies.

Silencer

Sultry September: they were snorting coke in a room upstairs at this party and, it was rumored, playing Russian Roulette. I had seen the pistol, silencer and all. Evening shadows cast an eerie glow of nowhere—someone pushed past me, frankly, to join the affair.
I now received these invitations because I had done the incumbent-upon-me thing— I was not lingering, looking at the poetry beau monde from the outside (perhaps sneering derisively), I was in the ring. Calloused fingers from writing half-meant reviews, credit card taxed from busing and planning around the East Coast and elsewhere, the door that was slightly ajar I had kicked way the hell open. I was, thus, at least one part hack.
But the silencer placed on me meant that no one attacked.

The Dare: Eighteen Months

March sun gathers then loses momentum, sets over Pine Street. The DJ ducks north on 10th, into a normal-looking row-home: more free dope in an untenanted wasteland— bathroom cabinets full of it. It's worth noting to him, six months in, that the Sword of Damocles doesn't hesitate to make its presence felt, even with tunes & other pleasant buzzes in the air; even with girls, crowds, press, compliments, the way they dance for his sets. Yet, he took the dare. This is the life he wants. The hangman's noose at the end can't matter. The noose is as real as this is: not for him.
He's being trailed: what he takes is being counted.
He knows. Another chilly knife-edge night. Why not?

Nights I Staggered Drunkenly

Nights I staggered drunkenly, down the winding, white-walled corridor which led to two major Highwire entrances (the ware-house space and the gallery itself); how it was that our version of freedom (Free School), stitched to good old-fashioned luck, had been allowed to recreate cultural Philadelphia from its insides out, I could never figure out. The set-up, me calling the shots, added a patina of raw power to my persona which had never been there before. I looked loose, worldly. I was, unwittingly, being scoped out by eyes raised on the rigors of politics, blended with also-raw eroticism, raw determination.
In the sense of a quintessence of material action, the world.
With that quintessential world, the possibility of quick, painful obsolescence— alongside the drunken rapture.

Beleaguered In Lasting

Two bottles of half-finished whiskey gaped on the island space, mid-gallery; green odors emanated from corners. The crowd, teens and twenties, ribald, projected an O-mind, as though a Pandora's Box had opened, allowing them to float in a stark bardo where salvation was granted to those gutsy enough to ride the rollicking waves. We had turned the right keys to let these people free, taught them the rigors of real freedom. My satori, then, was about responsibility.
Knowledge had to be passed what we'd accomplished here, in Philadelphia. Only I could give form to all the shapeless exuberance. Prizes yet to be granted to me strutted around, bathing in the warmth of our masses.
Another satori, more responsibilities. Beleaguered in lasting.

Ocean Queen

It was another drunken night at McGlinchey's, eyes and ears to the ground as usual, broken then only by your arrival. It must've been Nick who met you first, I don't remember, but I saw you were fixated on him. Hannah: you introduced yourself as a California bred novelist, politico. My appraisal was that your looks teetered ambiguously into divisiveness for those you might interest—heavy brows, wavy hair, tall, a bit tomboyish, also. But you established yourself as articulate, too: a charmer. I registered the sense that if I ever got you, it would be something gratuitous, a surprise, because you seemed to be a closed fortress, and choosing Nick seemed, also, to betray a masochistic streak. That night, his front swelled visibly with your arrival— I stepped back.

You were, must've been, I later realized, underwater somehow, surveying currents, examining the wildlife, surreptitiously and invisibly carving a watery path to me.
I had only what the male of the species always has—the equipment to complete your circuitry, potent or impotent in any time or context, waiting latent to take our moment, make it crescendo through the reef, weed, rock, as though destined, written into ocean's records an eternity ago, when all life dwelt in the ocean, all encounters occurred in resplendent semi-darkness.
And all this still sitting with the gang at "The Glinch," holding your own with a bunch of macho punks, who were taking something in Philadelphia by force, me selected silently, the tomboy a crowned Ocean Queen—

Undulant

for Hannah Miller

I'd made plans to meet you in Bar Noir on 18th; you were there; we drank. What happened after that, in the Logan Square flat, is that in defrocking you knocked over an antique lamp bequeathed to me by my aunt in Mahopac. Serendipity, I thought, stunned then into silence by your bedroom élan. Outside, a sultry night simmered; this night of all nights, scattered green glass littered my bedroom floor, and I finally got taken, past liquor, to what eternity was only in your mouth—as though you'd jumped from a forest scene (ferns, redwoods), a world of pagan magic, into a scene still undulant with possibilities—

Denouement

Was it even you anymore? You took the podium, began your screed: here's what Philadelphia could be.
The night proceeded from act to act— our enemies were taken aback— I now boasted big-boy curating entanglements. I knew that place— the wrong kind of underwater, piranhas hungrily looking for what might be real to rip to shreds, offal everywhere—was not for me, just as (to be stern) you were not for me either.
All your politico postures were about barnstorming fortresses set against you, ravishing them through pure force majeure. You were pure angel/demon, Hannah. I'd have to retreat to the back of your consciousness—an old conquest, not especially vaunted, burrowing down into binds to find reality, missing unreality's deliciousness—

Iguana

Sometime towards the end of the Highwire period, Gaetan moved into a walk-up row-home in the Teens, south of South Street, with an extended ensemble of crazy characters and, this time, a large, languid iguana.
I had a sense of exultation, watching him linger on his branch, in a wire-mesh encasement area, as we toked up, as usual. I felt he understood who I was, who we were,
with an uncanny, ancient means of reptilian knowing, not devoid of warmth, or whimsy. When Gaetan brought him out to roam as he wished, I could see the rapport they had was real. In a world in which you could be with, or without, he (whose name I admittedly don't recall) was with us.
I have, now, my branch, wire-mesh encasement area, & the rest.
He's remained with me. Not speaking for Gaetan, at least.

Russian Roulette

The vagaries of semi-transgression— I at least gave myself credit for waiting until the semester ended.
Add this, I thought, to my scorecard of offenses generated in the licentious Aughts. Who Julia was, sprung from Glenside into Pine Street not unlike myself, had an inner ache to write that itched painfully, so that she took solace from a literary lover who had been her teacher. Raven-haired sitter-on-my-shoulder, she carried back to Glenside even then who I was, had become. Narratives from her own life made the ache burn into full-out licentiousness, so that she threw what she was at me in a cloud of turbulent cuteness, drunken— drunkenly staged— but permanent.

She should've been a redhead, I thought, as she drew the blinds, locked the red wine in the cabinet, drained her glass, and bounced into bed— not precisely the Don Juana of her postures, more like a vision of Pre-Raphaelite schizophrenia, as one reads in Victorian novels.
Writing this, after twenty years, it seems dulcet, peaceful, rather than a plunge into a life or death game of Russian Roulette, which is what it was for us. The book I'd just published sat on the living room sofa, as if there could be any other reason for all this, the wine, the bullets; what I put into her was another kind of book. The full dome effect, for her, caused a thousand suicides.

Flaming Red Hair

The Last Drop lost its joie de vivre in 2009—Dani enforced this, acting out a script (tease, taunt, topple) written for her by South Philly goons. Why I'm now bemused by the gaucherie of Dani's gestures— cheap, black, low-cut dresses worn to reveal ample cleavage, flaming red hair styled always in plummeting cascades— is that in '18, no one's titillated by anything, let alone Dani— negligee stores derelict.
The truth of the imbroglio is an embarrassed grin, about a grueling summer day encumbered by our teased out, taunted out encounter. I must say I am tempted to lie. The bathroom door shut on us. The Drop was hollowed out.

In the end, I pined for Dani on those nights the grim reality of the recession still hadn't sunk in—as though the revelation, again, of her breasts could deliver me from shadows which impinged, but (it seemed) possibly only temporarily. Once, in her Pine Street apartment, she bothered to walk around before me in a bath towel— the teasing, taunting then brought, it would seem, to apotheosis. Permission granted, then denied, pushed past, joie de vivre visited upon the bloody-minded redhead, forever. Dani knowingly inverted Mary and Abby— lineaments of gratified desire replaced by sharpened knives.
In the ascendency (the Philly party being over), Dani turned graciousness disgusting— symbolic leg extended, foot resting on sink.

Incarnadine

First Friday, Olde City, autumn: I watched Abby seduce a curator in the Artists House Gallery, clawed my way past buskers and vendors, up again to Logan Square. Then, up 21st Street, over to the Franklin Institute, out onto the Parkway, where a slight tilt will show you the Art Museum; back over and around, and wandered into my flat. The soft October warmth told me what I wanted to hear, for a hot minute: eternity, ecstasy, elevation, riding the waves on an ocean of buildings—Center City's own, wholesome ocean. A great recession was approaching, destined to pinch some of us to death, but in the end, it didn't matter— Abby's striped, clinging gown that night, wavering between maroon and plain red, marked my brain as permanently made incarnadine, for her and us—

Portal-ways

Was it through you, Abby, I managed to do Queer Studies 101? Here's what I saw: you aligned yourself with bad girls, to make yourself look formidable, lived a life of intermittent lassitude & discipline, tawny head bent down to study coded missives you dared not decipher, and then the bittersweet aftermath into postures you earned for yourself. Girls in a row, a pretense for an artist of your magnitude. Was that all you had inside you? I wonder, but it's none of my business, as the Neo-Classical portal-way built into your brain hovers around the Earth for a few centuries, and the paintings themselves form a row, disciplined, formidable, coded, bittersweet—

Glass Doors

It isn't difficult for me to imagine why it might be that, painting and drawing done for the night, Abby would stand outside Mary's glass-paneled, completely curtained double doors, and listen to us making love. All this time later, I see it as a manifestation-in-action of The Lost Twins, from Abby's own vaunted masterpiece, rising to the surface of Abby's brain, and asserting their presence. The male-leaning twin laughs at all the pushing and grunting, the sleazy cheesiness of what I have between my legs (she has one too), as though I thought it made me big in the world (it did not) to bang away at Mary as if the world depended on it. The profound dumbness of sex and sexual intercourse mixed with the pride of her own phallic presence in the world, doing an even more manly routine of being split, being two people at once. She could make both of them thrust through the surface of human life, into art taken from two places, willed into brilliant singularity, in a way the grunting moron could never understand. The male-leaning twin wins.

The real girl twin remains a coy maiden, building up the guts to let herself into bed with me, jealous of Mary's easy submissiveness, as though to the manner born, of letting the man be the man, however dumb, and riding the waves towards twin peaks, rather than Lost Twins, behind glass doors.

Dresser

It wasn't real, was it, or maybe it was, us, there, together in bed, as though you were Mary, as though we were married, as though you could be her, that person, generating domestic sweets for your old man. He, gnarled after a long day of fighting in the world, ready once again to prove potency against oppressors who would have us cold, limp, silent, faded in that beige-walled bedroom. Us, lifted above the rest of the apartment, wooden dresser catching your eye to show up later, in a painting not related to me, also there as someone only partially related to me, searching the world as your own scout for signs of visible life, the dresser livelier than me, its grains, fronts—

Feast or Famine

I knew the Manhattan you grew up in well indeed—the Upper West Side— gruesomely built of blocks of primitive brick and stone. But, for you, with two orchestra musician parents, a ticket into New York Bohemia, bagels and lox from Zabar's, then nothing, popcorn, then back to Zabar's. Whether feast or famine, no forced schooling for you, just days at home with paints and canvases, from a young age, for company— hours of repetition, breakthroughs.
Always unease, that what you wanted to paint was too formal, too advanced, for the land of Warhol and Koons. You were ready for Philly.
PAFA, drugs, dykes, all in preparation for finding it, your mind's precious Rosetta Stone.

Your vision grew limpid as your life went crazy—ensconced in the Center City beau monde, directing traffic, wedded to an Irish witch who wished you the worst in the end, every distillation of visual perfection in your brain found refulgent form, as you found time to fall into my arms as well, and I rode analogous waves.
Why it was all lost then was simple— the girls, your girls, didn't like it. They were threatened by a genius they knew to be easily trounced.
I never let you go. I still won't: the halcyon nights we spent remain the guiding light of my life, in this world and beyond, you and Mary, bruises or afterthoughts be damned, Rosetta Stoned—Michelangelo's Tarantula

If she left us nought but paintings, no pictures of herself, what else might we say of Diana, except that she was also Jenny? I could always mail to her in space, wherever she is, a copy of How To Win Friends and Influence People. Or the prize of a free golden easel, for having forced her hand in where others dared to be more real. For always looking slightly different, and as is fashionable in the mid-Twenties, a hundred dollar gift card at Bloomingdale's, so that access be granted to the elite of make-up counters. I saw her blonde, brunette, and tawny. There can't be resentment at throwing the paintings around— she could paint— but knowing why her expert moves to seduce me, employed at a moment of maximum susceptibility on my part, worked, I am inclined just to understand why whoever she really was, would have to skulk in interminable shadows for the time being. Diana, who was Jenny, can never disguise herself in the paintings. She's a livid soul. The Maryland sticks I refuse to comment on much, except to say that, to paraphrase Jeremy, even their minor accomplishments are overshadowed by their utter anonymity. So, I went around like Michelangelo's David (a bumbling oaf, sort of, as Mary saw it), fucking everything in sight, and I fucked her and fucked her again— as a blonde, a brunette. I was to miss her in representative tawny form, because that was the most real, right?

A dumb oaf like me is righteous material as a sitter but to be avoided as a husband. Mary proved that. Or did she? Diana just wanted to be the Jenny to show up, surprise everyone and cause trouble. Just like all those lovely tarantulas she so admired. There is no Michelangelo's Tarantula, but that's the whole point. Mary's idealism, and handy camera, gutter-ball into Kanzler's shadows, and eternal vacancy.

The painter's brain seeks the transcendental in sensuality; once it's achieved, does the routine maintenance work of holding it, conserving it, memorizing it, filing it away in the special cabinet for what makes human life, in all of its squalor, worth living. It was taken for granted, when we were good, that we could give each other such a life.
This marked place, I have a cabinet for, too.
The places are all marked: Logan Square, for one, as the sunset appeared from bay windows; Liberty Place Towers to the right, due south; the Franklin Institute due north, courtyard full of curiosities. It is understood that these are what make up your brain: colors, forms, tableaus— a succession that was me for you, too.

Sultry nights in West Philadelphia were another vocabulary for us— grass plots dotted the concrete yard beneath your window, wood-paneled floor, wooden dresser taking our tripped-out trysts, making them rustic. A poet's brain transcendentalizes language and philosophy— I always trusted as secure, what started with you and sense. Grounded in sense, right there on Baltimore Avenue, was an implicit engagement with taking what was banal in the script of our consciousness, shaking it loose.
It's all in my own cabinet now, about shock, spark.
No one ever gave me a better life— pathways from sense to oversoul-level awareness, fastening color to what could remain uncolored. Passions.

III. Miscellaneous Sonnets

Swiss Army Knife

Lizzie enlisted her Swiss Army knife, started sawing away at my arm as I arranged my rock collection in our dirty basement, which she was visiting. Joanna dozed in the corner. As she saw first blood, Lizzie lifted up my wrist, which was being used, and sucked away. It so happens this, my first genuine affair, hit me at three, with a witch and a vampire who I loved, but who lived to rock the proverbial boat. I took her on rock collecting expeditions in the woods near the Old York Road Little League fields, and she remained happy as long as her steel did its business, which I liked then, still feel.

Boston

"I suppose he told you that I landed between his legs like a roguish girl… well, you could say it happened that way. You could also say he sold me on the idea of veined trade, or that his musky Scotch breath excreted wafts of blue bloodiness into me. You are perverse to ask me these things, moon peering over your shoulder like another rogue. For now, he lays upon an altar you don't know is there: drunk, blue." The director called cut; stagehands shuffled towards cigarettes.
I wandered down the aisle towards the stage, about to land, looking for your money-shot—found a ticket to Boston, first-class, reservations for a four-star Boston hotel, invitation for an audience with a Brahmin princess. The dream, I thought, continues, as I saw you sit on the stage, begin to peruse a style magazine which has now been discontinued. I laughed, too, as there is no fashion in a freezing New England winter, but your breasts, which are considerable, do get extra-perky, and when you try to sit on my face, I just might let you. As for your old rival, she's got wings to star in a musical over in Cambridge, a version of Guys & Dolls they've got going.

It's a sparkling scene in every direction; an epoch-making time. The cage has sixty-nine layers of gild.

Bringing Down the Light

At one point, I had a room in Henniker overlooking the Contoocook. At night, lights from the stores down the road (I shopped for snacks, booze) shone on the moving river, improving it, casting an ethereal glow on its surface, birthing in me a drunken high I still carry, about New England in winter. The store-lights here were about artifice, humanity, taking Nature hung in one perpetual blue sky above us, bringing down the light to create effects.
The light that most truly shone, the Contoocook knew. She was an admixture of dark and light, lived in the river. That's a metaphor. Or water.

Jim Jones

Refugee from a tempest, I arrived in New England feeling like I conducted electricity, like anything could happen to me. The pissed community didn't like where I was publishing (or, to be uncharitable but more accurate, that I was publishing at all). I was on the phone with the Philly arts press, right there in Henniker.
Only moments later, Mary would arrive, easily a match for her Philly counterpart, able to wager I'd climbed up a mountain, might be able to help her. Jon Anderson, turns out, had become the Jim Jones he wanted to be, followers crawling out of his ass. Becky Hilliker's life was its own wager, on one great poem she was depending on me to publish. All that imagery she shared with Mary—the water, fish, how bodies of water resonate with women, fish also— coalesced into a sense that she was a pistol that needed badly to be loaded. All the action happened that summer underwater, in cahoots with this primordial semi-darkness— Becky talks on the phone with Gaetan in Philadelphia, reveals for the ages that that city is no stranger to her— Becky strips to bra and panties, rope-swings into the Contoocook— and, of course, Mary and I drink a concoction of pure cyanide Kool-Aid, so that an eternity of massacres ensues between Boston and Virginia, families wasting followers like ants. Yet I carried with me, implicit, brotherly love for all. Or tried.

Frequencies

for Mary Walker Graham

I.
"We're at our most bestial when threatened not with hatred but indifference; what our blood wants is reaction of some kind." New Hampshire night, our own reaction, you pliant, penetrable, laid out beneath me as flies fidgeted our room, pirouetted moist air. Yet we sank beneath bestiality to do just what indifferently we wanted, beneath our glut of blood, so the summoned beasts might react with this: ripped limb from limb, buried in low-lying Virginia swamp marsh, given what aphorism is only got in extinction, darling, as I quote what you said at the bar before. In other words, they hated us. The one-night stand wouldn't matter if your brain didn't have the right words in it: stories, sequences, slammed-down metaphors of a singed self. Frequencies.

II.
As the world between her legs tightened around her, what she saw in bed with me was stark: okra, stamens, roots, all that in nature coalesces in erect growth; and a shadow father bent, then erect, then bent again, perverse from amassing wealth in a world whose submissiveness poisons him. Beneath the sultry, wooded surface, what I saw was a semi-frightened animal, along for an all-night ride (gruesomeness of 4 a.m. New Hampshire sun), knife thusly thrusting into the backs of everyone around her, managing to have stamina enough against constraint to take what she was taking. The mattress thumped: above, an angel was unable to conceal laughter, understanding it was all in the script, including the garish sun's leer.

State of Grace

Grape soda bottle on the desk; wind, out of Eleusis, shut the door. Our clothes came off; your limbs spun like spokes. I peered outside; it was light. New Hampshire summer sun, four a.m. Poets to face at breakfast.
Workshops to sit through, lectures, but I knew I'd never have you the right way again, or any way. We'd done the thing once we'd been meaning to do, so as I stepped from the window, gazed at you dozing, naked, I thought to myself, maybe that's what amounts to a state of grace—you're given something once, fully, so that you may be satiated with it, and that's it—

Luggage

Luggage lugged in by refugees from wealthy families lay beside the bed we occupied, to do our dance. I saw it, in the middle of the action—black leather, initials embossed in gold— tried not to notice that it was sentient. It berated you, for the duration of our tryst, delineating ways this was a betrayal, to sleep with someone of inferior caste stripe, with steep consequences. When a severed head broke briefly out of a suitcase, it reminded you, red-tongued, the debt you owed could never be paid back, the grisliness you visited upon your clan could never be rectified. All the severed head looked to me like was roses with thorny stems, tied in a knot— clairvoyantly, you saw the real deal. The sleeping roll predicted your condition as mendicant when the sex was over, the word passed. The abomination between your legs could only be alleviated by the anti-Vaseline which sat leeringly on top of the luggage pile, lubed from yellow to fluorescent blue. The luggage, to me, was just prejudice from a sector I chose not to understand.

All I knew is that our bodies compelled us to co-mingle.
That was enough. Off in the distance, trumpets blared to begin a holy war. Red seas were parted. A king perused the catalogue they'd given him, jeweled scepter scoping out highlights. I was a pawn. He knew— if you own the guns and the money, everything else comes, too. You, then, fell asleep. I was entranced by the early sunlight. I thought of states of grace, you dreamed of Red Death. More luggage.

New Hampshire

I could've used you in New Hampshire that summer, rope-swinging into Contoocook River, dope-huffing out in the fields with Jon Anderson, his gang, your future rival (unbeknownst to all) tapping her feet in anticipation of new reasons to mope, make metaphor. I could've understood why it might be that your rival could never be your friend—too tense about counting her fingers, toes, too loose on the juice, or (cruelly, for all) maybe just right, simpatico?

Frontiersman

I was unaware, until Jon Anderson jolted us into awareness, that there could be a baby version of a Bowie knife. The seminar room sloped upwards from the front; Mr. Anderson levitated, with lascivious abandon, above us, as the baby Bowie did its mischievous task of shearing one white slat of the blinds in half.
Jon crouched like a frontiersman skinning what itself could have been a mischievous rattlesnake, the snakeskin a prize or trophy to adorn an abode not much less primitive than a tee-pee, the frontier half-conquered. I did not need a reason, then or now, to understand why the emergence of the baby Bowie was necessary. But I carried with me the brotherly love that, from Philadelphia to New Hampshire, affirmed that displayed force could be a necessary weapon among poets.

Pricey

For reasons pertaining to mysterious circumstances perpetually manifesting behind her, the obvious sense of the erotic, of us as potential lovers, never happened with Becky and I. She was from a rich family like Mary, or wasn't; was engaged to a newfangled Kennedy look-alike in Boston, or wasn't; gave hints of being suspiciously well-traveled, Boston not being her real home, or didn't; the Becky circle game in Henniker never resolved any way.
As I watched her strip to rope-swing into the Contoocook, there was in her physiology something desperate, something that wanted badly out of whatever situation she was in. Swing she did, as I had, the river briefly swallowing up the blonde with pricey curves who no one was allowed to know that well.
Except to say that she had obviously read Mary, though the two were wary of each other, and admired the river-deep heft, drowning potential, of who Mary was in text, the dramatic persona she had invented for herself— sullen, yet regal as the queen of Egypt.

Whether the pyramids for Becky were the same tropical resorts, mansions, five-star hotels, rented yachts, and acres of plush green as they were for Mary, in the end doesn't matter, falls away in irrelevance. The queen's eyes direct a piercing gaze at, or into, the female body's acknowledged or unacknowledged death-in-life, stasis amid whatever dynamism pretends to assert its force, horror at empty tomb-like space filled with mummies preserved from livid memories. For the few seconds Becky was submerged in the Contoocook, the idea of the voluptuous female was tormented into awareness of superficiality, like a five-star hotel, which offers a continental breakfast, no guarantee of morning sun.

Stetson

Understanding how narratives intersect, wanting also, in this book, to stay crisp about telling the truth, it stands to reason it should be known that at this time, Abby would have no idea I was in Henniker, or what or where Henniker was, or about Becky and the rest. Abby's knowledge of my day-to-day life was so-so, as was mine of hers. Mary, Philadelphia Mary, was off our maps then too, having briefly sold her wares back to a semi-forgiving family, eager to bury her in money and marriage lectures.
Mary was a sucker to briefly believe, too. Abby, I now believe, would've wanted to paint the Contoocook, and Becky, and would remain unsatisfied that Becky continue as anything but one of her girls. Mary, Boston Mary, was slightly too mean, too hard. The juxtaposing of Abby and Henniker, in fact, involves an Abby-style catalogue of how the place looked being created, even as that task be placed in inexpert hands. Pivot-pointed by the campus we occupied, the first point of interest were several streets, placed at a close-but-odd angle to said campus, of the kind of ornate, plantation worthy houses you might associate with Tennessee Williams plays. In fact, one spook of Henniker was a ricochet to places like Tennessee, or the Great Plains. You might hear, in Henniker, country music at any moment, or see a Stetson hat. Home on the range.

The campus, linked to the town by a paved bridge, was built on the basic principle of the down-home. Abby, I predict, would've liked the river-view deck at Daniel's, the town's premier tavern, and all the different ways the town framed the river, including big, rustic log cabins, complete with portal-ways.

Laps

Odd, cutting in from an angle as it does to suggest a level of eternal damnation— that what happens in the world is often second or third tier garbage, what could have happened consequently rules the celestial seasonings roost— Becky, I believe, had in her something more wild, more libidinous than Mary did.
I saw it as she stripped down by the Contoocook—the desperation on view was part of a double-sided coin deal, the other side of which was, or appeared to be, ecstatic release. Mary and I were trapped in an advanced version of a dormitory room; if I attempt to encompass the imagined seduction of Becky, I notice in my own physiology the sense that the river would have to stay in view, our rite an advanced Innisfree rite, connecting us in a vital way to the landscape.

The Becky I imagine is not a semi-frightened animal, along for someone else's suggested ride. The metaphors in her head are forgotten, as she channels the great post-language wavelength of real sex. Mary's words were herself— no more, no less. Becky chips away at something in language she likes, but the fish in her is fluent, past language, at the expressive motion games beyond any articulation at all, when existence is just doing. Our brief tribe manned fields usually empty at night— I extend my imagination back to those fields, to find if this fish is striped, in the secret way female fish are striped, to accommodate what laps we might do, so anticipate the gruesome New Hampshire sun.

Suffering Nature-Goddess

For the male of the species to gaze into the swamp or morass of female subjectivity— when the male would be me, I first notice this peculiarity— that Becky and Mary seem to station themselves so uncannily close together, when the creation of text is the issue. The acknowledgement of bodies of water as an objective correlative is nothing new.
Why the city of Boston engendered female textual twins, to take bodies of water and add to them a note of dementia, horror, ominous lubricity, shot through, in a contradictory way, with equally intense sensuality, transcendentalized into phenomenological plays in self-created textual zones, lifted into an ether of the female body magnified a thousand-fold—suffering nature-goddesses, crucifixion by absorption in nature nailed to brains— is difficult or impossible to know. I do know that the zone I write from has more city in it, less nature. I could never be a suffering nature-god. But perhaps at the end it is about New England itself, what the ricochet of all those long winters built into these poetesses, about mythologies found most appealing, also about suffering and redemption. The night at Daniel's in Henniker Becky sat caddy-corner to me, in a pink polo shirt with the collar up, as I had seen the stiffer kids do at U of Penn, I understood that, as postures go, Becky was too real, too human, to really pull it off.

No one thought she was a liar or a poseur. I simply watched, as she made her exit for the night at around eleven, that she was slightly downtrodden with alcohol and loneliness. Mary was a more dire open wound— alcohol and loneliness meant she might just take someone home with her. Someone had to stop the bleeding. Becky was able to hide the spilled blood. But the core— suffering nature-goddess— they shared.

To Jon Anderson

I have to laugh, Jon, to remember how the moon hung over the open field behind the river, where we all sat, smoking your spliffs, reciting poems, and, for me, checking in with the Philly squad to see if everything remained in place. What's funny is that what we never found out remains the most important thing— how far would or did they follow you, after the party was over; what more could you make them do? Hypnotized into place, set in staunch motion by bells ringing all over the goddamned place, what gave?
The wildness of lying in the New England grass, deep into the night, seemed to tell me we'd never find out. What you would do with your tribe would be your secret, ribald or righteous, just as I'd retreat invisibly from this crew back to Center City, Becky back to her brahmins, Talia back to Rhode Island, God knows where, and the rest.

What we meant there that night was funny, kiddies let loose to party all night, yet kicked in the ass by fate to acknowledge that when a group creates a frequency in the universe, it can linger in space for a long time, humming its tune, smoking its dope, carrying the river, making it earth.

Assault Rifles

Amidst other thumping noises, another monster emerged in Henniker: distant, at first, and then deafening, yet only to me. Steve seemed like a modest Midwestern kid.
Beneath a corn-fed exterior, he had a maverick streak.
We finalized a friendship, formed from frowning on what this New England context was— a poetry plateau parading its points towards a tepid center. We both felt beckoned by the avant-garde, its brainish insistence on seeing past cliché. The Internet was emerging as a new Wild West for the avant-garde to play around in— we wanted in.
Chicago was Steve's promised land. As the Aughts extended its parameters, and as we were deadly serious (others, more casual in Henniker, moved their money, cultivated courtly connections), I took the plunge, found myself in Palatine. The Midwest impressed itself on me: flatlands, everything spaced at odd angles (unlike the East Coast's loaded clusters), more presence, liveliness to the firmament (sky seemed to reach down, do a scoop), bungalows arrayed everywhere. Steve had ins with the scene—we assaulted Chicago, hungrily, which happened to be crawling with avant-gardists at that time. It was a dream—to really pierce into a foreign, unexpected city, exotically.

No way, still, to see where it might lead. Out in Palatine, Steve crafted calculated moves. He produced books hewn of disjuncture, skewered directions, historical lampoons.
We saw the same things happen, around the international avant-garde, at the same time. Our online routes were similar.
What you did in the city was, better be, assault rifles displayed. Mister.

Author's Bookshelf

"I am the hippest bookshelf in the Midwest. All hail!" An émigré, such as I was, walked North Milwaukee Ave as though it were Main Street, Manayunk. Myopic Books beckoned, always, from a huge height of literary hipness, and yes, I got them to carry me, Steve not having a full-length yet.
Few of us get to realize such glamor-puss goals— going forward, the phallic thrust of conquest is never continual.
In fact, time's waters forced a soaking in the sluggishness of stasis for this particular writer, wrung out on a decade of complete craziness, as he was. All I needed to know then, as the congeries of circumstances brought matters to a head, was that this was lifetime material, a miraculous prize. That's as I understood how the game, beginning with Myopic, had gone.
It was to be made an instant classic. A king from a pawn.

Standing in the June Heat

Standing in the June heat outside a dank, dreary Andersonville bar, not hustling your ass for a night in your apartment, how young were we?
Had I dissolved into a post-fantasy version of me, potent past the little first edition you had me sign (Aughts energy, whirlwinds, celebrities, cities, caught up in a new century blowing instant nuts off instantly), or was it the same old Indiana shuck and jive—in love, lust, life, lit, to move past corn is to be husked, cradled down into shallow graves; all selves underground?

Into the Dawn

If I contrived it— vodka-rocked, summer-burnt—from Moody's Pub in Andersonville to her pad, placed in an obscure part of the Loop— the mystery, what might've been, remains. Stacy had her own obscurity skirmish to surmount— the filthy rich minister's daughter from Indiana, with a religious calling to avant-garde lit, and blonde goddess to boot— who had, by the fateful night, fallen in love with my first full-length. There they were, covering the plush, green-toned flat symbolically, as I imagine them— the good book and the racket book— the actual bible, with the bible I had penned for her. That, I believe, is the unholy heist I would've uncovered, maybe roughly, in that flat. Not in her bed, I would guess—despite the resemblance to women from my past, I would've received the floor to sleep on. Leading us off the cliff of the cross, and another cross borne— the one hung solemnly on her wall, about her childhood, family, heritage, money— and the one borne in her heart, which wanted to live as I had with Mary & Abby, staunch sensory immersion in a series of starlit moments.

That's the key to Stacy's dilemma, universalizing the night's detritus, which would've been the same had I accompanied her home or not. To unify body and soul is the work of several long lifetimes.
The divided, L-shaped human race cannot conceive of a reality in which the books are all good.
As a person part text, I held her all night, into the dawn.

Colliding Crops

April cruelty of rain-chilly wind, six months until harvest— Stacy stands on the verge of a realm not tearless, but over tears, so that tears themselves form a kind of second skin around her, and the child to be born in cried out— here, I notice, is a place where I could've been no one, still have no substance, and what pours out of me, as I absorb the Indiana farm-land, is just refuse of what I've never had—this is what she writes out of. The erstwhile female is replaced by a raw-nerved, patterned, womanly archetype, solid as a silo, to be picked at by the little-minded for occupying space in a man's arid world. Corn-rows tilt to be livid both ways.

Apostrophe

Chop up text from dirty French novels, throw in some candy hearts, make it a production, all for what reason? That this was all building to some astonishing climax, as our bodies reached through envelopes to grasp with greedy hands desired limbs? I wasn't sick of it then, because it is interesting to dance with raw desire— to imagine the eyes, the breasts, the sex, how they all might look in motion, in rapture, in the only text that really matters, from the safety and security of line by line, phrase by phrase, apostrophe by apostrophe. The letters remain, tied up in a pink ribbon, in files closeted, now just memories of limbs once animated by real heat, forcing language to go where it falters, where hands give way.

Mobiles (2009)

It's company of flesh and blood I need, your blonde head beneath, pillows scattered around us like confetti, memories of loneliness suddenly quaint as "thou," our voices in the air like hung mobiles—then, all the thousands of words left behind in throats overtaken by cries, grateful awe before near (dear) extinction.
But you are not here, you've become just a lack, something scrawled on a series of sheets, useful only to tell me that words have holes in them where nothing fits—wind moves the mobiles past position articulation.

To Stacy Blair (2009)

A flaxen beacon in my brain—how could you be more than this: an ideal reader lapping up my obscure literature on a foreign continent, a fingered box opened to strange whims, a space mapping interstellar distances, overdriven in lust, overcome. Yet when I sit and write this out, I see how much there is of you in me; I don't know how it happened, except that you read yourself into my body, an ocean of wine, salt.

Power Yoga

The way it had been, in the realm of benevolent decadence, power yoga, for Mary and I, had been about a pulverizing impulse to get as high as possible, and to achieve as much ecstasy along with it. This had been accomplished with the jouissance of two equals, who were equally bandits about trouncing day-to-day life with levitational exercise.
Now, days and months passed in which I was always asked to pick Mary up at a Walnut Street Studio, up in the 40s, parallel to Baltimore, after she spent a few hours baking in a room heated up to ninety degrees, doing yoga poses in tights, or other leotard outfits, which tended to emphasize her extreme leanness, testimony to a noodles-n-vegetables diet, unbalanced by the emergence of fats or proteins. I was asked to eat dessert, when I did, on my own. I always found funny, that the idea of power yoga, in an Arizona-simulation room, gave Mary the sense that her physical mechanism was cared for. We still did some levitational tasks. But power yoga was adumbrated for her along with her membership in Mariposa, West Philly's organic food co-op of choice, making it a clean sweep for vegan Mary to holistically redeem her years of excess.

Mary was eager for me to try power yoga myself. I demurred, along my own party lines, well-worn ones, that power walking all over Center City did the task I needed to do of keeping my own mechanism in shape. The mood of the Aughts in Philadelphia had begun to dissipate. Now it was or seemed to be, every individual for themselves. The real power yoga we did together was to understand that Mary's family was keeping a tight rein on her. No meandering forward on an endless road. We were a stretch.

Moue

What a path it is, the one Mary could never follow me down— the path of worldly largesse. When you take worldly largesse and make it about the arts, what you get is a hodgepodge of different ways creative people can be big or not big. To win big, you have to lose big, too. Lots of people are just fronts or pin-ups, being told what to do. The creators for real are the creators for real. By this time, moving in on the late Aughts, Mary's apartment, on Baltimore down from 4325, had a fire escape where she could fit two chairs, and we'd sit outside on nice days and chat. My talk about Chicago, New York, London, Australia, was scenester talk. It took for granted, being an in person on a fast track. Attendant on being in, a fulsome load of log-rolling to do, all day every day, so that I rolled logs to Mary, in front of Mary, in spite of Mary, around Mary, and so on. I noticed what anyone would notice. Mary just did not have it in her to harness her queenly, court-honed instincts and put those logs into rolling motion herself. There was a not a perpetual moue, but when I spoke about scene in-matters, Mary gained a glazed, tuned-out look, and tended to fixate her eyes on the diagonal steps over our heads, that ended in the plateau on which we sat.

No view, but a small space from another, differently angled portion of the same ten-story building, Mary being on the seventh floor. An interesting composition, linear structure for Mary to look at. More interesting than what I heard about the feud tearing apart the East Village, or my own feuds, which were substantial. Mary was meant, we both discovered, just to paint.

The Blasted and The Balanced

Keener eyes than mine have discerned— Philadelphia has ways and means of mixing elegance with dilapidation, engendering urban landscapes that mix grit with grace. Mary would not be on Baltimore Avenue if the architecture did not balance what was inevitably decay, detritus, concrete jungle ambience, stenches of exhaust fumes and the rest. So that, for Mary to paint from Spring Garden, it had to be the admixture, again, of the filthy and the fine, the blasted and the balanced, or her brain could not generate correct cognition conditions for colors and forms to manifest. The sense in Mary of discretion, lifting her above the art rabble, what I would call hipster-ism, made it so that when Mary opened the door to her 915 Spring Garden co-op, it was with the sense that her being who she was would, also inevitably, make whatever was painted rise above the rabble and do its own dance of the blasted and the balanced.

Spring Garden

Because our rigors of love and lust had so much starlight in them in the early Aughts, it was easy for me to see, many years later, that Mary had tired slightly against all demonstrative physicality. There was less she was in the mood to do, and what she did was less involved and less generous. It felt, often, as though she were withdrawing from life in general, interest by interest, piece by piece. The last conflagration of energy went into painting The Fall. Once that had been accomplished, the sense was that she manifested as a completely privatized person. In other words, she did not manifest. All the totems of our marriage were left to me. Towards the end, I had taken her on the road. She met the poets in Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Boston. What she made of the other Mary was uncannily about a resemblance which made me laugh up close. Mary from Boston was retreating by that time, too, as a major recession moved in on the United States. All of us in the late Aughts flailed around resource-piles which began to disappear. Mary's co-op studio in Spring Garden, where I posed nude for The Fall, was the site of no cocaine madness, sexualized histrionics, or any delinquency. Mary's family had kicked the shit out of her. In a way, it was better. She was more deliberate about what might amount to her final artistic statements. Cocaine buzzes had made her careless. Except, now she had to feel all the painful emotions the cocaine used to pleasurable, luxuriantly numb. There was no escaping that her painting life was a long, slow road. Several floors up in Spring Garden, as she had been in her PAFA studio, and with the grunge of North Philadelphia beneath her feet, she found time to tame, demystify my naked body, the body of Adam, for herself. He was David, too. But he wasn't Jesus. Or even close.

Javelins

for Jenny Kanzler

Artfully arranged arrows engorge hidden quivers she carries, everywhere she goes. Each day registers as a clarion call to the hunt. Javelins are squirreled away for special hunt days. The self-generated mystique of the girl warrior magus makes others nervous.
What makes it onto canvas— Spanish-colored visions of child-like dilapidation, children blankly born into the special dwarf dodo dance the human race does— takes, transcendentalizes violence into a vision quest for the most morose human truth, tripping eyes into realizations of deep, absurd diminutions. This is a woman unused to conventions, around that word (love) which cannot appear in her paintings, themselves sharp like javelins. Her eyes cannot be anything but green, but her carnivore streak is pure earth.

I cannot deign to speak of where, how, why she was raised, except to say that what was needy in her crystallized as her most precious asset. The child in her cannot die.
That the special circumstance is not a coincidence—the analogous morose days I spent in Bethesda in my own childhood, dragged unwillingly by those I had no idea were adversaries into a matrix, corrupt in its tininess, lying in all directions to cover up stunted, blunt motives— can remain in the grave where it belongs. It's all too sad. But transmuting sadness into anger, anger into representational panache, is what this Diana does best. She, too, would look ravishing at the center of the Great Stair Hall.
And could laugh, here and there, at the whole thing. Between shots.

Pride (in the name of love)

The buildings are the road, voyage, reason.
The spirit you think is there, in architecture, is there, along with other spirits, namely, spirits hewn into coexisting nature, creating a sublime sense of balance. Apotheosis of coexistences.
The collection of buildings here is resonant— shudders, palpitates, resonates. Where & how you get touched is the enchantment variable. It could be Fayette Street (two churches), City Hall in May, Butler Pike, even the lunar landing lunacy of Dekalb Pike. The road you travel on is into the cosmos.
This is it— my Philadelphia. The buildings say everything.
What I say now is reason again, to bring us roundabout— the buildings are the road.
What is really in the cosmos remains the mystery.

Butler Pike

The entropy, enervation of a recession—consciousness rots, abraded by the obtrusiveness of a dull, jagged populace— I stroll down Butler Pike, snapping pictures of the houses, & the buildings penetrate into my brain, more than the people. Architecture is its own phenomenological explosion, occupying space inside/outside the mind, standing in now, for better or for worse, for the people who could occupy similar space— what I notice, as sentience emanating from the buildings, is that architecture is how the human race expresses its relationship to nature. Here, our choice is a sturdy yet ethereal harmony, formidable, eerie, which foresees who might occupy the houses, & yet chooses to manifest the ornate over the plebeian, or merely practical.

When the ornate (the aesthetic) is set in place in the Philadelphia suburbs, it is an expression, also, of the region's apparitional vision, relation to a wider world than even material nature; out into physical space, into the cosmos, against the restraining force of the earthly. So, in a roundabout way, I get closer to the individuals who have planned or charted the buildings through allowing them (both) to seep into my brain.
Relationships, in recessional times, abstract themselves— I stretch towards acceptance, gratitude.

Starlight II

What starlight means to someone sober, such as I was not in the old days— it would have to be the sense of lives lived not uselessly. As in, who we were had a burning sense of purpose, even amid the ecstasy of moments we lived through—gossamer ones to hold onto. It was not for nothing who we were, what we did. How the grass-plots, yellow-leaved autumn trees, other foliage, informed us, heedless as we were, was that we would gradually ripen into a long life no matter what. If that life would have to begin with me, so be it. The sense of sexual union, crescendo, orgasm, was in our brains too, about what had moved us, & made all the libidinous business resonate on a double level.

We were in each other's bodies, and in each other's brains, I dare say, the right way. If an odder family has never been seen, a family we were. The starlight which could descend on Mary's room— eastern exposure, lavishing the long wooden dresser with flat countertop surface, Mary's various paraphernalia—has now transmuted into a knowing stripe. Assured, also, of enterprises, personal and otherwise, coming full circle, just as Abby used circular forms to out-Klimt Gustav himself, and of eternity borne out through trust in nature, long patience. So I leave myself with Mary there, doing what we always did, but precocious about vindication, passages, reality.
The starlight finds a little place for us, for this.

Strange Side

There's the strange side we were on— the ones who most mean it about high art— in earnest, of course, about form & content on high levels. Then, the side which accrues to & against that side, about pedestrian reality, paying bills. Then the side which attempts to mediate these realities, day by day, out of which other sides emerge, escape valve sides, wanting to get drunk & high. And so on. The strange side means a strange life of partial or total alienation, surfaces found insulting. The recompense for Mary & I— our nudity to each other was strange nudity.
On the strange side, how much interpenetration could be possible between two human beings, as something worth investigating, could land us on alien terrain, so that at 3 am, in a fit of blended love & lust, being inside her could be participation in the space-innards of the Milky Way, language expanding from images, vice versa, simple white sheets ample space for stars to be born, live entire lives, & die on, as though our bodies scooped up primordial ooze to allow the universe to be born from them again. Now, I sit in a diner on Fayette Street, still on the strange side, & take from pedestrian reality what I can take, sort of alienated on sort of alien terrain, sort of drunk & high, & nothing has to end, sort of. I still mean it about high art. No sort of there. I think of Mary then, love still blends with lust. Stars live & die all over again. Strange.

Marble

"You little paranoid bitch, doesn't it ever bother you that you're incapable of having relationships? You tell me you "feel awful all the time," don't you think there's a reason for it?" Digging in to half a century, on what's literally my fiftieth birthday, it occurs to me what a gyp to whole thing really is, for me, Abby, & the rest—try to do a little good work, they'll always find a reason to hang you. That last time Abby was splayed out on my floor, once I'd moved into a less idyllic, low-ceiling'd flat, no sex, just the sense that the wall between us was insurmountable, on every level. She left her bike in front of my building.
I spent her tirades composing an answer in my head, putting her on tape, as she was supposed to be talking about Mary. She was being naughty, talking about herself. Late summer, bedraggled, just as this February day is bedraggled by extreme cold, Plymouth Meeting under ice-sheets under ice-sheets, the East Coast gasping for heat. The tapes, precious ones, got dumped when I moved out here. No getting them back. Just the sense, on my birthday, that the real present has to be that I ever heard her voice at all, in a world full of promising circuits never established, incendiary matches never made. So Abby felt awful all the time, and why shouldn't she? Like everyone else worth a damn, she missed the ticket to her own enfranchisement. But the last almost-fuck is now marble.

Concrete-slab

Preciosity is bad, right? No one wants to be precious. Yet if something is precious to you, you might die to protect it. Let it be known—Abby had, for a few years, her own personal YouTube station. One of her girls gave her a small camera, little more than a hand-held, and Abby taped herself giving monologues, right at the edge of still having her looks, in a West Philly squat with no windows. My favorite, in the aftermath of our final almost-fuck, was called "Militant Atheism," and jabbed from the angle that there are no militant atheists, the nature of atheism negates being militant. No-God cannot implore to do, act, or kill. She got big numbers—the station was a reasonable success. Given a few years, the station, and all the videos with it, disappeared.

You can bet someone, somewhere still has it, and them—Abby's final ricochet, with in-built, New York-level, media-savvy provocativeness, for those who watched to do something but gawk at the gorgeous bisexual.
Precious? Who I was, as I watched, had seen a lot of life, without understanding much of it. She was more than a conquest, by then— I knew she was a genius.
I also noticed the concrete-slab walls, knew she was living poorly, haphazardly. She had, after all, spoken to me about suicide. I'd slipped into debt without really realizing it, too. The Aughts had left us both numb, flailing around. Concrete-slab closing in. Precious.

Amenities II

Stomach-plummets, the ultimate hemorrhage for those watching who cared— at a certain point, it was obvious to all that Abby was sticking needles up her rear end. She spoke in speeded-up bursts, rode single points for too long, fidgeted restlessly when forced to sit still, and it fed her TV persona, to be sure, but her already paranoid temper took her over a steep cliff when the camera stopped rolling. If I was going to avoid being on the receiving end of another tantrum, I'd have to stay out of her way. Not that I saw her around much. Still ensconced in Logan Square, I knew she was dumped in a hole in West Philly somewhere, and that, as hurt badly, she had lost her family's support. She needed it. The work she did for the dyke patrol— who knows? Except to say, the idea was obvious, that she had no notion of painting in the foreseeable future, or having her own place, as she once had. Her girls were her family now. They were happy to give her a camera, but no food, speed-up-the-ass but no insurance, cred in the right drug houses but no heat in winter, no AC in summer. Abby established a life with no amenities. What she had already painted sat in storerooms, waiting to tell whoever asked that she was not meant to be a brief flame, a degenerate tart. I myself was pulverized into the position of confidante, who had heard her do a monologue about suicide which didn't make it onto the confounded station, but allowed me to understand what a life with no amenities was all about, speed-freaked or not. Her family in Manhattan thought whatever they thought. The ice she skated on was too thin.

The Color of Flame

Ripping into the innards of the beast who was our scourge, it stands to reason I should iterate why I was not in line to save Abby. The tangle has points of complexity, points of simplicity, too.
Abby's girls were her family. In Abby's mind, the fact that we'd had a physical affair, which led to other things, earned the sternest disapproval from her girl-tribe imaginable. Yet Abby's imagination was paranoid, and it seems unlikely now they regarded me as that much of a bete noir for them over anyone else. The towering rage inside her— that her family were gone, her paintings unsuccessful, her entire life reduced to almost-complete material impoverishment—instinctively lashed out at anything which threatened her connection to the family left to her. That anything was me. The truth buzzes around these constituent elements uncomfortably, itself lashing out at the idea that any of us Aughts crew knew anything about anything— yes, I could've saved her. If she could have been led to trust me again, rather than regard me as a pest seducer, the work could've been done.

Of course, it was not. I can horde all the fool's gold I want, nothing can be done now. The beast who was our scourge, as I see it, fed on artists' bodies & souls, who had been given too much too fast. We had no time, in those days, to make sense of anything. We were who we were, did what we did. We wanted our lives the color of flame— a color, painters know, which cuts both ways.

Plain View

There it was: it could only happen once, that I saw you for the last time. To take the livid, coal-black rings around your eyes (black rings, also, not surreptitiously around me-who-could-be-to-you, who seduced you, led you away from your girls, from whom the needle-injections tattooed all that coal), dissolve the black into the gold which was actually in your brain (which bid you see the world strangely, shapes, colors, lights, movements of them, with incredible vivid cleanliness, jarred into narrative motion, again, by split-in-half sensibilities, being twins), all that needs to be done is to put the paintings in plain view in the world and step back. Plain view is still plenty difficult, but I'm willing to find my own eye-rings to do it.

To Abby Heller-Burnham

What solidity the years deliver— against the grain of ephemeral travesties forced into our lives, graying, fogging our eyes— I think of you on those West Philadelphia nights we all got bathed in starlight, in benign coloration, so that space/time grew fluid, and complex compositions coalesced. There, splayed out on the wooden floor of Mary's room, without our own consummation having happened yet, or needed to happen, the composition of my thoughts coalesced, that now remains centered. The multi-tiered ("twinned") spatiality in your brain remains what it was, circles under and over circles. I'm immersed in light, shade, passageways, earth-tones, bird-eyes, and their opposites.
The composition of us together, how its resonance remains, was imported from out in space, which we shuddered doubly into, too.

The Schuylkill Moves

The Schuylkill moves cleanly, despite all the murk, as the Expressway looms on the other side of it. The trees, as usual, are Heaven, rooted much too deeply for us to fathom, stacked at solid angles into a receptive Universe.
I am waiting, writing on the edge of wars, chopping through the cesspool of centuries old shit, stunned into an awareness of you, Abby, and of our life's binds.
When I imagine you, it's with a sense that we're both standing at the river's edge (we are, of course), and as long as we see, your way, the trees shade into the sky, the binds hold—
